WHEN the unique significance which the Christian church has ever recognised in its Founder is under consideration it is sometimes suggested that the explanation is to be discovered in the influence of personal affection. The lofty predicates which believers have associated with him are the creations of idealising love. They are imaginative forms into which the affectionate disciple puts the ardent feelings that arise in the contemplation of the object of his love. We wish to indicate one or two reasons why this solution appears inadmissible.

Christian discipleship does not originate in the region of the affections. The New Testament writings, early and late, come no doubt from the hands of those who profoundly loved Jesus Christ; but their love is not the creator of the worth they find in him and the designations they attach to him. Precisely the converse is the case; their affection is the consequence, not the cause. Something has been done for them, has been wrought in them, their lives have known a great deliverance, they have risen from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. They are conscious of redemption, of being brought into communion with their God; they know this as Christ's work upon them, know him as the author of their deliverance, discover in him God reconciling them to Himself. Their love is not the product of an external admiration, the happy sentiment of attachment to a pleasing personality; it is the deep and permanent emotion of gratitude to a Deliverer who has broken their bands in sunder. When they speak of him as Saviour and Lord, as the Son of God, as the express image of His Person, it is something more than an enamoured imagination that finds voice, it is the record of realities that have been appropriated by the soul.

We misinterpret the secret of Christian discipleship, therefore, if we look for its foundation in the affections. It begins in the conscience, its first evidence is a troubled spirit. It is not as the King in his beauty that the disciple first recognises Jesus as his Lord. He is not taken out of himself to gaze upon a gracious character in delighted contemplation. He is driven back upon himself and constrained to know himself in a new light. Contact with Christ as we meet him in his historical existence does not suffer us to remain the interested spectators of notable actions and enchanted hearers of wonderful words. Pastimes of this nature have no relation to the Christian life. Its first moments are full of pain and disillusionment. The first evidence of its reality is the searching judgment which against our will we pass upon ourselves. We convict ourselves of sin, we awake to the sense of guilt. We do not stand enraptured before a loveliness that is without, we are face to face with the deformity within. A new need lies discovered in us, the need of conquest over our sin, and we realise it at once as the most clamant of urgencies.

It is true that the fact which gives rise to this experience is no other than that which helps us out of it. The influence which the image of the historical Christ exerts upon us, while it destroys our self-complacency, restores us to confidence; while it effects the sense of a pressing need, follows this up by ministering to its satisfaction. While it afflicts us with the discovery of what manner of men we are, it exalts us with the revelation of the manhood into which we may rise. The same power as brings us the consciousness of our estrangement from God wakens the trust whereby we know ourselves accepted with the Father. And then, indeed, does our love go out to him to whose historical existence we owe what we have received. But this love is the final, not the initial, link in the series of experiences. Nothing can be less adequate than to represent them as the fond exaggerations of idealising sentiment and admiring reverie. They testify of iron that has entered into the soul, of easy satisfactions broken up, of the whole edifice of our self-content shattered to its base. It lies not in the way of contemplative admiration to invent aching realities such as these.

The Christ who approaches us through the avenue of conscience cannot be resolved into any subjective creation. The Man who works such havoc with our self-esteem is scarcely the product of an arbitrary fancy, roving at will. Were we making of him what we pleased, we should scarcely fashion the picture of one who cuts us to the quick and takes away our ease. "If this has been our experience," it has been said,* "we may indeed be sure that we have not merely pictured a Christ after the wishes of our heart; for the constraining influence which the Jesus Christ of the Gospels exercises over us is often sorely in opposition to our heart's wishes, nay, oftentimes he offends us with sharp pains."

The Christ of the New Testament is a being whose primary significance for all who testify of him lies in the deliverance he has wrought in the sphere of their consciences, the burden of guilt he has removed, the new life he has planted in them. This is not the ground on which capricious idealisations take their rise. On the contrary, it is just where the conscience and Christ's impression upon it are put in the second place that fancy is free to play around the figure of the Master and outstrip historical evidences. On this field the mediæval mystic and the modern rationalist are not seldom at one. It is the same unchartered subjectivity that leads Bernard to the ecstatic contemplation of the Bridegroom and creates for Renan the fantastic Galilean of the Vie de Jésus. In every act of idealisation there lurks the consciousness that we are on a certain equality with the object round which our fancy works. Bernard, for example, asserts that "in intercourse with the Bridegroom awe ceases, majesty is laid aside, and immediate personal intercourse is carried on as between lovers or neighbours," a situation only thinkable as implying the equality of the person loving and the person beloved. A similar implication underlies that attachment to Jesus which many found on what they have discovered as the salient fact about him, his likeness to themselves, a discovery which opens an easy door to the licence of sentiment.

How far are all such notions from the experience which controlled the writers of the New Testament! Their characteristic attitude is not so much love for Christ as faith in him, not so much discursive affection as a humble and reverential trust. Its essence is confidence in one who is immediately acknowledged as a superior, whom they confess as Master and Lord. Nothing is further than the thought that anything in the nature of equality connects them and him. For them the outstanding fact is their unlikeness to him, their whole interpretation of him starts out from the sense he has produced in them of the wide interval which stretches between his stature and theirs. This is no metaphysical question of diversities in nature, it has nothing to do with any analysis into the human and the superhuman, distinctions which have existence only for the speculative reason. Their perception of his supremacy has not come by way of the disinterested understanding, but through the constraints of the moral consciousness.

The supremacy of Christ in the faith of the Christian Church is, therefore, neither a speculative judgment nor an exuberant idealisation. It registers an impassioned moral conviction, established in the conscience by an objective reality.

There is nothing meritorious in personal attachment to Christ. Nay, rather, it is an encumbrance to the religious life where it has not produced the sense of our own want of merit and our need of the deliverance which he brings.

"CHOOSE LIFE."

Sir,—In replying to Mr. C. W. Jones's "trenchant criticism" of my paper, I must confess to one grave disability. I have never been "in the inner circles of Unitarianism," and do not even know where they lurk; so that I can lay no claim to the "authority" which residence in that enclosure has conferred on Mr. Jones. My humbler appeal must be to the reader's candour and love of truth.

I am not ignorant of the good work of the Liverpool missions. Yea, who knoweth not such things as these? In my original paper I urged upon all our congregations the duty of doing likewise. I never said that Unitarians were the least brotherly of Christians; on the contrary, I expressly said that the faculty of brotherliness was as great in the individual Unitarian as in any man. It is not the lack but the inhibition of this faculty that makes us the least brotherly of the sects. Can this be denied, when even Mr. Jones, after vindicating his own brotherliness, goes on to say: "To organise our scattered, independent causes into a Church .... would be fatal to their principle and life"? And once again, if it be true that we are full of denominational brotherhood, and all our rich men are God's stewards and almoners, how comes it that a large proportion of our ministers receive less than £200 per annum, and many of them less than £100?

Mr. Jones points to the Augmentation and Sustentation Funds as "examples of the way in which well-to-do Unitarians generously subscribe." I cordially admit that there are generous subscribers ("well-to-do" and other) to these two Funds. I urge nothing against the consideration and discretion with which they are administered. Nevertheless, these two Funds signally illustrate both our defective organisation as a community and the imperfect degree in which our rich men realise their responsibilities. Why are there two Funds, instead of one? Why has a minister working North of a certain line to wait a year for what his brother-minister, a few miles to the South, may receive at once? In neither case is any right on the minister's part to the increase of stipend acknowledged. It is a "grant," given or withheld according to the irresponsible judgment of a committee in whose election he has no voice. And when all is done, what a short way it really takes us towards the provision of a due stipend for all our ministers! Will anyone seriously contend that our rich men could not wipe out the whole scandal, without putting themselves to the slightest privation? So long as this rightful claim is not honoured, so long—whatever honourable exceptions there may be—our rich men as a class cannot be unreservedly praised for the use to which they put their wealth.

The omitted words after the word "Church," in my quotation from Mr. Jones, given above, are these: "with a central executive to have control over them." Nothing like these words is to be found in my paper. They are Mr. Jones's own addition, and exhibit his idea of what a Church must be. The strange belief that any movement towards corporate unity is necessarily a movement towards some form of tyranny—that the body exists for the purpose of maiming the hands and feet—seems to have wide currency among our people. In order to see how utterly baseless it is they need look no further than to the Congregational and Baptist denominations. The corporate unity which they have severally attained is not only consistent with, but actually founded on, congregational autonomy. Mr. Jones's dread of a central executive makes me muse concerning the nature and function of those "inner circles" to which he has belonged, he tells us, for so long. Have "inner circle" and "central executive" any common field of connotation?

I too, like Mr. Jones, attended the National and International meetings in London, and my experience there fills me with joyful hope for our church that is to be. The spirit of such a gathering is irresistible. That sensitive self-sufficiency, that paradoxical suspicion one of another, which are the chief obstacles to the Church life of our people, melt away in meetings such as these, like evil dreams at the sunrise. Conference after conference does the same sanitary work, and our membership one of another becomes year after year more real and vital. When Conference meets every year, the visible union of congregations which never cease to be one in spirit, bound all together in bonds of mutual trust and love, and by the common worship of the God of Truth, it cannot be long before our Church begins to feel her single life, her single strength, and to use it whole in the service of Our Father and our brethren. E. W. Lummis.

THE LATE EDUCATION BILL.

Sir,—I must ask your kind permission to occupy some portion of your space in making some observations upon the interesting communication on this subject from your respected contributor, Mr. Harry Rawson. If he is good enough to question his judgment, when at variance with mine, I am much more so when my own differs from his. He is, of all men, the most universally trusted in our Manchester District; and, especially, on any educational subject is he, by long service of the cause of education in all its branches, possessed of our confidence.

It is, accordingly, with diffidence, that I find myself out of agreement with him in regard to the late Bill. I welcome, however, points of agreement. I am entirely at one with him in a portion of his criticism of the policy of the late Mr. Forster as embodied in the Education Act of 1870, and in the treatment by him of the Voluntary Schools. I have always objected to the cumulative vote as leading to the representation of ecclesiastical interests rather than those of education per se. I have always objected to the policy by which Mr. Forster, while establishing his School Board system, gave new life to the Voluntary Schools, by simultaneously increasing the Government grant to them by 50 per cent. I was, at the time, a member of the National Education League, and humble follower of Mr. Chamberlain in his unauthorised programme of National Education, compulsory, unsectarian, and free, with the School Board system made universal, not supplementing, but supplanting, the voluntary system, and ridding the education of the people, once and for all, of the "virus of Sectarianism and Clericalism."

And, in advocating the retention of School Boards as the educational authority, I have the same policy of "thorough" in view, under a reformed School Board system, rid of the cumulative vote, and occupying the whole ground, to the extinction of the voluntary system with its clerical control and ecclesiastical aims, and with its lack of means and consequent educational inefficiency. Under such a system of universal School Boards there would be "the control of the ratepayers" as completely as if the County Councils were the educational authorities. The objection as to the election of School Boards for three years applies to County Councils equally; while the Education Committees proposed in the late Bill, with their coopted members, would have been largely out of touch with the electorate. I press the danger of such members being coopted to swell a dominant sectarian majority, just as aldermen are chosen to swell a dominant political majority. The late Bill was designed to obtain rates for denominational secondary schools, and would have imported sectarianism and clericalism into secondary education, and would, moreover, have tended to introduce that fatal element into County, and County-Borough, Council elections. No worse service to those bodies could there be than to infect them with the baleful sectarian spirit in elections, and more grievous still in the conduct of their administrative duties.

But the late Bill was introduced in a speech which went much further than the Bill itself. It laid down clearly and unmistakeably the principle approved, I am glad to find, equally by Mr. Rawson and myself, of one educational authority for elementary, secondary, and technical education. The Bill was manifestly only a first instalment of a larger policy; and the policy was to entirely supersede School Boards by County and County-Borough Councils. It was the thin edge of the wedge, to be pressed home another year. It displayed the cloven hoof. The real aim of the Bill was to obtain this year the new county authority, and next year to capture the county rates, not only for secondary, but for elementary education. The voluntary system is at its last gasp; it is breaking down under the intolerable strain. Its only hope is to enter the promised land flowing with the milk and honey of subventions from the rates. If the late Bill had passed, we should have had denominationalism in public elementary schools endowed, before we were a year older, out of the pockets of the ratepayers, and the death-knell of education of the people, by the people, for the people would have been rung. The real secret of the hostility to the School Boards, and of the erection of County Councils in their place as educational authorities, is that it is the only way to circumvent the Cowper-Temple Clause. That clause will not allow the denominations to touch a penny of the rates. That clause is a vital part of the School Board system. It is the charter of unsectarian education, an educational citadel to be defended at every cost. If the policy of the late Bill in its covert attack upon it can only be defeated, we are within measurable distance of the collapse of denominationalism and the elementary schools, and of its replacement by a truly national system of education with Universal School Boards. I admit everything that Mr. Rawson, with his long experience and his great services in the cause, alleges as to the fine work done by Municipalities and County Councils in connection with technical schools, free libraries, museums, and art galleries. Their Committees, with coopted experts, have conferred great benefits on their fellow-citizens. But I, none the less, have much more faith in direct election by the people, and in responsibility to the people.

I have myself sat on a School Attendance Committee, and a Technical Education Committee, as a coopted member. I have not felt the call upon me for constant service to be so vital as if I had been sent there by the votes of the people; I have not felt the responsibility to be so great; the breath of popular appointment is an invigorating thing; I have missed it. I am certain that popular control of education in all its branches by direct election of those who are to administer the people's schools is better alike for the administrators and the people and the education than any system in which irresponsible experts find place. I know well the opinion of John Bright on the subject of Municipalities undertaking alike the education of the people, and licensing. But, in addition to the fatal objection that their introduction into the municipal arena would lead to elections being fought on sectarian and liquor questions, often to the exclusion of others, and be productive of sectarian wrangles and liquor debates in Council Chambers to the confusion of business, we want, for the constitution of the one education authority, men and women who are thorough educationists, to whom it is the main public interest and who will devote to it all their best energies.

Moreover, as to the power of rating being in the hands of School Boards, they know best the needs of education, and they should have command of the public purse to meet them. Amid the multitude of claims on the rates, unless the School Board could send its rescript, there would be great danger of education being sacrificed to other demands; while responsibility to the ratepayers at the triennial election is a sure safeguard against extravagance. If committed, it is sure to get a lesson at the polls not likely to be forgotten. I do not concur with Mr. Rawson in his rather depreciatory estimate of the work of School Boards. No doubt there were sectarian debates in many of them in their early years; no doubt in some cases ecclesiastical jealousies interfered with the work of education. But these things are less and less in evidence. And nearly all the best elementary education in the country is found in the Board Schools. Nothing was less justifiable than Sir John Gorst's attack on School Boards in his speech introducing the happily defunct Bill. No bodies of men and women deserve better of their country.

HOLIDAYS FOR POOR CINDERELLAS.

Sir,—I notice that you are good enough to allow our missionaries and others to appeal through your columns from time to time for help in their work. I should be glad if you would kindly extend the same privilege to me and allow me to appeal for help in a little mission work which I have on hand just now. With the aid of the young people of my school I have been carrying on a Cinderella Club for some time past. We have 120 members in the club, and they are of the poorest and most destitute class. Many of them are children of widows; where there are fathers they are mostly disabled or men beaten in some way in the battle of life. My little "Cinderellas" are not connected with any particular church, and the nearest guess I can make at their religious sympathies is derived from the fact that several of them address me as "Father." They are hatless and shoeless, many of them, and it is to the cold and hunger of their little ill-fed bodies and the pity of their sunless lives that we address ourselves, rather than to the discovery of their religious association.

Through the winter they meet weekly at our schools for a long happy evening. We give them a good meal each week, some simple instruction in singing, &c., and then fill up the evening with a lantern entertainment or something of that sort. During the summer the regular meetings are suspended; but I am anxious to give them a great treat—namely, to take them away out of their narrow streets to the sand hills on the sea coast for a week. I have made arrangements for them to go to a camp for the week, and what it will mean in health and pure joy in their lives none of us can tell. To many of them it will be a revelation; to them all it will be a blessed breath of pure air and a week free of care. If any of your readers can help a little in the expense without allowing any of their charities nearer home to suffer I shall be most grateful.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Gateshead.—The first anniversary services of Unity Church were held on June 30. On the preceding day the members and friends journeyed to Durham, where they were met by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie and friends from Middlesbrough, Darlington, and Newcastle. After a walk through the beautiful woods and a visit to the castle, tea was partaken of on the river-side, by the kind permission of the Dean of Durham, who accompanied the party. The ancient minster was visited, and great interest was shown in this historic structure and its old records. On Sunday the Rev. Francis Wood (Sunderland) occupied the pulpit in the morning, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie in the evening. There were good congregations, the evening being very large. The hymns which were sung at the opening of the church twelve months ago, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and the Rev. J. C. Street officiated, were repeated. An augmented choir rendered anthems. The services throughout were a success and an inspiration.

Ilkeston: Welcome to the Rev. Dr. W. Griffiths.—The Rev. Dr. W. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D., the newly-appointed missionary for the Ilkeston and Burton districts of the North-Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, received on Saturday last a formal welcome at Ilkeston, where a tea and a public meeting were held in the chapel. The gathering was a most influential and representative one, including the president of the North-Midland Unitarian Association, Mr. F. Winser, J.P., of Nottingham, and visitors from Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, and Mansfield, besides representatives from other religious denominations. Mr. Winser said that he was glad they had established there once more an established minister among them. Dr. Griffiths, whom they had pleasure in welcoming that night, was a Welshman, and formerly belonged to the Congregationalists. Even as a young man he had shown himself possessed of exceptional abilities, and owing to the munificence of some of the members of the church to which he was attached, and who some day hoped to see him a Congregational minister, he went to Carmarthen College. From there he proceeded to the University of Yale, U.S.A., and thoroughly bore out what was expected of him through his earnestness and diligence. He acquired a valuable degree, and when he left the University he (the speaker) believed that Mr. Griffiths was fitted by his talents and learning to take any chair for Old Testament history in any college or university. But while in the university Mr. Griffiths was apparently getting more and more opposed to the religious ideas with which he started life, and when he left Yale he found that his views were not at all in accordance with the traditions of the church he had been connected with, and on close examination of himself he discovered that his ideas leaned most towards the religious community of which they were members. Under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association he became a missionary for the Pontypridd district, and there came across one of his most enthusiastic supporters, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd-Thomas, the pastor of the High-pavement Unitarian Church, Nottingham, and it was with this co-operation that Dr. Griffiths had been asked to come down to Ilkeston to take up missionary work for the north-midland district, and more especially for Ilkeston and Burton. He was glad to invite Dr. Griffiths among them, and as President of the North-Midland Association he extended to him a most cordial and enthusiastic welcome, and he hoped the members of the church would for a long time receive the benefit of his culture and wisdom. He asked every one there to join with him in the welcome. He trusted that Dr. Griffiths would have strength to perform his duties for a long time to come, and that he would have a most successful career among them. The Rev. N. Fysh, the superintendent of Ilkeston Free Methodist Church, remarked that from what he knew of Dr. Griffiths he was glad that he had come to the town, and he hoped that he would gather round him a good congregation, who would receive benefit from what he expounded. Mr. Fysh also alluded, amid some amusement, to the vicar of Ilkeston's action in complaining of his identifying himself with the Unitarians, saying that in matters of religion he should just take his own honest, straightforward course. He himself believed in good fellowship and friendly feeling between the various Christian bodies. He had known Dr. Griffiths's predecessor, the Rev. E. A. Maley, very well, and trusted also to know intimately Dr. Griffiths himself. The Mayor of Ilkeston (Councillor R. Hunt) also gave warm welcome to Dr. Griffiths. When he heard that Dr. Griffiths was coming he felt that Ilkeston was to have a valuable addition, not only from a religious but from every point of view. Already he had made himself felt. He appeared to be one of those spirits full of life and energy. And there was a great freedom in Ilkeston for his labours, if only people allowed him to operate upon them. The Revs. T. M. Lloyd-Thomas (Nottingham), E. I. Fripp (Mansfield), T. G. Thomas (Ilkeston Congregational), H. Gow (Leicester), W. Perks (Derby), and Messrs. J. C. Warren (Nottingham) and W. Taylor (Ilkeston) each added a welcome, and when Dr. Griffiths had made response to the chorus of congratulations and expressed the hope that his efforts at Ilkeston would lead to some material good, the gathering dispersed.

London: Channing House School, Highgate.—The teachers and pupils of this school united on June 20 in presenting Miss Dangerfield, who is leaving Channing House, with an address, accompanied by a purse of sovereigns and the works of Browning and Mrs. Browning. The address bore the names of nearly 200 subscribers, including that of the manager of the school.

London: Forest Gate.—On Saturday afternoon, at the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Young (hon. treasurer), a congregational party visited Hill House, Romford, where they were most hospitably entertained. The day being fine, the garden proved very attractive. The host and his family were indefatigable in attending to the enjoyment of their guests. The younger members played tennis and other games, the Upton-lane Glee Union sang, and friends gave recitations.

London: Lay-Preachers.—A reunion meeting of lay-preachers in the London district took place last Thursday, at 24, Inverness-terrace, W. No such meeting has been held for some years, and gentlemen who had frequently occupied the same pulpit now met for the first time. Needless to say, there was much to talk about. Three papers were read respectively, on "The Position, Message, and Equipment of the Lay-preacher," and a discussion followed each. A very helpful evening was spent. The gathering was made possible and rendered additionally enjoyable through the genial hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. E. Howard, who kindly offered their residence for the occasion. Another meeting is projected for the autumn, when it is hoped some absentees will be able to attend.

London: Little Portland-street.—On Saturday last the members of the Rambling Club visited Hampstead Heath and Golder's Hill. Afterwards, on the invitation of Miss Tagart, a garden party was held at Manor Lodge, Frognal-lane, to which the members of Little Portland-street Chapel and the Portland Institute were invited. There was a large attendance, and at the close of the evening a warm vote of thanks to Miss Tagart for her kind hospitality was passed, on the motion of the Rev. H. S. Perris, and seconded by Mr. E. Ellius, on behalf of the Institute. The minister takes the first portion of his holiday on July 14 and 21. On the first of these Sundays the pulpit at Little Portland-street will be occupied by the Rev. G. Critchley, B.A., late Congregational minister at Burnt Ash, Lee, and on July 21, by the Rev. William Wilson, of the Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—The services at Wilbraham-road Unitarian Church have now an additional attraction. The organ, originally built by Mr. R. Jackson, of Liverpool, which has been for many years in the Ancient Chapel at Chowbent, has been generously presented to the Chorlton congregation by Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., of Tyldesley. It has been renovated and improved by Messrs. Alexander Young and Sons, of Manchester, and was used for the first time at Chorlton on Sunday, June 23. Mr. Herbert Walker, organist, of Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross, presided at the organ on that day, and after the evening service he kindly gave a most acceptable organ recital. The services were conducted in the morning by the Rev. J. Ruddle, and in the evening by the Rev. D. Agate, B.A., of Altrincham. On the following Thursday, June 27, a special musical service was held, for which the members of the choir at Chowbent, with their organist, kindly gave their services, and the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, gave a short address. Mr. Ruddle voiced the thanks of the congregation to Mr. Eckersley, to the Chowbent friends, and to the Rev. J. J. Wright. Mr. Wright spoke very tenderly and effectively of the bond thus created between one of the very oldest, and one of the newest Nonconformist and Unitarian congregations. On Sunday last, June 30, Mr. Herbert Piggott, of Leytonstone, Essex, presided at the organ very acceptably at both the morning and evening services.

Oldham.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps preached here on Sunday last to large congregations. On Monday he gave a lecture, entitled "What, then, is it to be a Christian?" There was a large attendance. The Rev. J. A. Pearson, who presided, alluded to the recent affirmation lectures, and trusted that the townsfolk would learn effectually from such addresses as those and that to be given that evening what their teachings were. After dealing with several orthodox definitions, Mr. Hopps spoke on the ideals of life presented in the Sermon on the Mount. At the conclusion a hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Hopps.

Pudsey.—On Saturday last four memorial stones were laid in connection with the new class-rooms, the persons laying them being Miss C. C. Lucas, Miss J. Brown, Mr. H. Gott, and Mr. J. Marshall. The Rev. W. H. Davies (pastor) presided, and addresses were given by him and those named above. After tea a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. G. E. Verity, who said £450 had been subscribed or promised, £280 of this amount being raised by the congregation and friends at Pudsey. The Revs. E. C. Jones, W. H. Eastlake, and C. Harvey Cook, and others gave addresses, and the whole proceedings were marked with much enthusiasm.

Swansea.—The anniversary service of the Sunday-school was held last Sunday afternoon. There was a good attendance. The scholars performed very creditably the musical service published by the Sunday School Association. Excellent addresses were delivered by Messrs. C. H. Perkins and Edmund H. New, of Evesham. Mr. Perkins spoke on "Kindness," and Mr. New on "The Immanence of God." At the close of the service two presentations were made by Mrs. Tudor Jones. Mr. David Harris was presented with Harnack's "What is Christianity?" for his faithfulness as past superintendent. Miss Alice Clegg, one of our teachers, was presented with Professor William James's "Psychology for Teachers" and Professor Macgunn's "The Making of Character," on the occasion of her leaving the Swansea Training College for her home at Rochdale. Miss Clegg obtained first place on the Government Certificate List.

Walmsley.—Last Sunday was "Sermons' Day" at this old chapel. The day was as fine as could be desired, and many hundreds of people, as well as the preachers for the day, had a supremely happy time. The morning preacher was the resident minister; afternoon and evening preacher the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., of Birmingham, whose services were highly appreciated. The collections, with donations, amounted to £58 0s. 6½d.

Home Missionary College, Manchester.—The session which closed this week presents a very satisfactory academical record, four of the students having graduated at Victoria University, and several honours being taken. The Rev. J. Page Hopps, at the valedictory meeting, July 3, gave a welcome to the students who are now joining the ranks of the ministry. A full report will be given in our columns next week. Other important gatherings of the week include the centennial meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association and the Missionary Conference.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids. It possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and the S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plynlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.P., says: "A fortnight in Aberystwyth is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

Carlyle, Darwin, Gladstone, George Eliot, Ibsen, Matthew Arnold, Bradlaugh, G. F. Watts, Mazzini, Queen Victoria, Newman, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, and James Martineau are the "makers" the author discusses, and with some of them he has been brought into close contact. The papers are liberal, informative, and sympathetic, and will appeal strongly to the Nonconformists (and more especially, perhaps, to the Unitarians) as well as the ordinary student of modern history.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"THE memory of Theophilus Lindsey, fragrant as Sharon's rose; the remembrance of his sacrifices for truth is sweet even in death." So ran the "sentiment" proposed in 1849 at the "Pilgrimage" to Catterick, which is being repeated to-day; and many who cannot be among the hills of Yorkshire join with the pilgrims in honouring this good man and praying for a share of his spirit.

MR. JOHN FISKE, probably the most penetrating philosopher yet given by America to the world, died last week. He was not yet sixty, but he had done a good life's work; and the specially interesting feature of his evolutionary philosophy was that, without strain or violent reaction, it steadily became more theistic as he grew older. His three little books, "Man's Destiny," "The Idea of God," and "Through Nature to God"—the last published in 1900—ought to be read by all serious thinkers. It was once hoped that Mr. Fiske would be able to deliver the Essex Hall Lecture, but the arrangements fell through.

THE Conference Committee on Superannuation must be heartily congratulated on the very successful start made with their Fund. The advertisement on our last page to-day shows that the supporters of the movement are both widely representative and cordial in their support. The thing to be desired now is, as we said last week, that no one should hold back on account of his inability to give large sums. It is specially encouraging to see so good a beginning to the annual subscription list. In short, the whole thing looks as if those exceedingly awkward but useful persons who ask for tangible "results" from meetings either of the Conference, or like those held in Whit-week, would get one more answer of a peculiarly satisfactory kind. For most people, the present is supposed to be rather a trying time financially, though we do not hear of any important falling-off in holiday-making. A quiet little preliminary word, or modest note, to the treasurers of the Fund would in many cases, we believe, add immensely to the pleasure of "going away" this year.

THE second reading of the Education Bill (No. 2) was carried on Tuesday evening by a large majority, but not without severe criticism by several supporters of the Government. The gravity of the position could hardly have been inferred by a stranger listening to Sir John Gorst's speech in support of the Bill; but before next winter is out there will be an awakening if the Bill, in its present shape, becomes law. The opposition to the Bill on the part of the great body of Nonconformists and of Churchmen acquainted with the work of the great School Boards will certainly be strenuous, we wish we could be hopeful of something better resulting than angry debates. No doubt if the Government mean to do so they can force the Bill through as it is, but the scandal will be great if they do; and not the least part of the mischief will be that the policy indicated will tend to add to the local council elections one more disturbing element. They have suffered more than enough already from the admixture of imperial politics; add church and chapel politics, and what an embroilment must ensue!

THERE is to be a Conference on the Education policy of the Government next Thursday at the Memorial Hall, the conveners being representatives of all the greater Nonconformist bodies. It is no wonder that Free Churchmen are on the alert at this time. They know very well that the prepossessions of the clerical part inevitably lead to an injury being done to Nonconformists, not only as children or parents, but signally as teachers. If nothing higher prompted them to resist the attack on the School Board system it would be the consciousness that it is only due to it that so many excellent teachers, their sons and daughters, have had any chance at all of belonging to this noble profession. But there is also the certainty that the great Boards have raised the whole standard of elementary education, and that the party who are prime instigators of the Government policy wish to lower that standard, to the disgrace and danger of the whole nation. It is this that Nonconformists and earnest educationists irrespective of sect or party ought specially to denounce and oppose. We trust the meeting will be largely attended.

SIR JOHN ROBINSON, for many years manager, and for some years also editor, of the Daily News, and who for a long period was associated with THE INQUIRER, was entertained on the night of the 14th at dinner by Mr. Henry Oppenheim to meet a number of his old friends and colleagues in the Liberal party and on the former staff of the paper. Among those present to mark their sense of Sir John's great services to Liberalism and to journalism were Lord Spencer, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Brassey, Lord Burghclere, Earl Carrington, Lord Cork, Lord Welby, General Sir Evelyn Wood, General Sir William Butler, Sir Robert Giffen, Sir Edward Hamilton, Sir George Lewis, Mr. Arnold Morley, Mr. Charles Morley, M.P., Mr. Paulton, M.P., Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Burnand, and Mr. Henry W. Lucy. The company numbered in all thirty-eight. The dinner was at Mr. Oppenheim's private residence, Bruton-street. We congratulate our friend and wish him many years of honoured leisure after his arduous life-work.

THE form of declaration against Roman Catholicism which the Lords' Committee reported has been discussed in the House, and, as we surmised last week, it pleases few or none. So this delicate business must be reconsidered, and the Lord Chancellor not obscurely hinted that perhaps the next form will be even less comforting to Anglican Catholics than the present. A correspondent sends us the following suggested form, but we hesitate to commend it to the Committee as a practical solution of the difficulty :—

I declare that I will sincerely strive to learn and to do that which is right in the sight of God, and I will respect the convictions of all my subjects who do the same, as I desire them to respect my convictions; and I will not seek to force them to adopt my convictions by any threats or promises, nor will I be moved from my convictions by the threats or promises of others, nor will I seek to give to any of my subjects who hold any set of religious views any privileges or advantages over others, but I will endeavour in all things, so far as I constitutionally may, to act on the principle of according to the adherents of all religious denominations equality in the eyes of the law; and if any of my subjects unfortunately cannot feel faith in God, still, if they will but endeavour to learn and to do that which would be right in the sight of a Supreme Being of perfect wisdom and goodness, I will accord to them equal respect and equal right so far as I constitutionally may.

"That would be a declaration," says our friend, "worthy of a King and an Englishman, and worthy of a nation such as ours."

THE LATE EDUCATION BILL.

Sir,—I have been greatly interested in the two communications on the above subject that you have received from Mr. Harry Rawson and the Rev. H. E. Dowson. I cordially agree with them as to the desirability of getting rid "of clerical control and ecclesiastical aims," as also that one authority should have charge of elementary, secondary, and technical education, these being now recognised as steps on the same ladder.

The all-important question which we have to consider is as to whether education in its most comprehensive form is more likely to be advanced by those elected ad hoc, or by co-option for this special work from public bodies elected by the ratepayers for general business qualifications.

Having been a member of the Technical Education Committee of the Surrey County Council for nine years, and also chairman of a rural School Board for the last sixteen years, my experience may be interesting, if not valuable. I fully recognise that the work done by School Boards in the great centres of population has been excellent and most valuable; but elementary education in rural districts, whether conducted in the Voluntary Schools or in the Board Schools, has been, and is, a lamentable failure. There is no enthusiasm whatever for educational work; on the contrary, the parents of the children take far less interest in it since the fees have been abolished, and, speaking generally, their sole aim is to get their children away from school and earning money at the earliest possible age. As a rule the upper class consider the children are being lifted by education out of their proper place, and the members of the Board in too many cases share these opinions, and desire to keep the rate down and get the children employed in the parish. I see no hope of this condition of things being speedily altered, and in the meantime children are growing up in ignorance and under the lowest paid, and consequently most incompetent, teachers. Mr. Dowson says truly "We want for the constitution of the one education authority men and women who are thorough educationists, to whom it is the main public interest, and who will devote to it all their best energies." Possibly you may get such in the very large towns, but I see no chance whatever of electing them in the rural, and especially in the agricultural districts.

On the other hand, my experience of a County Council is that members gravitate to the Committees for the work of which they have special aptitude and in which they are really interested. The Selection Committee consult the predilections of every member, and judge of his known capacity for the work he desires to undertake; no note is taken of the political or religious bias. The result is that really good and effective work is done, by which, fortunately, the shortcomings of the elementary authorities are supplemented to some slight extent, although, of course, the work itself is rendered less effective from the want of preliminary training. Mr. Macan, the organising secretary of the Surrey County Council, points out in a most interesting letter on the subject which appears in to-day's Times, that: "Outside London and the County Boroughs, the evening schools, at any rate, are already in the hands of the County Councils. Forty-six County Councils subsidise or control by their regulations practically every continuation school in their areas; they spend £27,000 a year on their support, as against £17,600 spent by the School Boards in the same districts, and they have by their own efforts and organisation created three-fourths of these schools. I can point in my own experience to the creation in a single county of seventy schools (where four previously existed) in the last seven years entirely by the efforts of the County Council in face of the apathy, and even now the opposition of the majority of the School Boards."

It may be urged that in the event of the County authorities becoming the (elementary) education authorities, the sectarian strife which now often distinguishes the election for School Boards would be transferred to the election of County Councillors, but this, in my opinion, is improbable. Bigotry likes to focus itself on an individual agent, but here it would weakened by its probable ineffectiveness.

Sir,—May I ask you kindly to correct an erratum in my letter published this week. In the sentence "We are within measurable distance of the collapse of denominationalism and the elementary schools," for "and" the word "in" should be read. H. Enfield Dowson.

BERMONDSEY.

Sir,—I am happy to say that with the aid of the Provincial Assembly, and under the supervision of its excellent minister-at-large, Mr. Edwards, the services at Fort-road are being carried on, and the allied institutions are maintained. I hope I may be able to report more definitely as to the future of this congregation by and by; but I write now to ask for kind help in providing an excursion for the Sunday-school. All will agree that these "orphaned" innocents should not be deprived of their annual treat, and I shall be glad to receive contributions on their behalf. The amount required is estimated at about £10.

All sums received will be duly acknowledged in these columns.

SUMMER SERVICES AT COLWYN BAY AND RAMSAY, I.O.M.

Sir,—Will you kindly permit me to call the attention of your readers to the summer services to be held shortly at Colwyn Bay, North Wales, and Ramsay, Isle of Man, under the direction of the Missionary Conference, final particulars of which will appear in your advertising columns.

We have secured the use of the most attractive halls in both places. The pier, with its handsome pavilion, at Colwyn Bay, has been granted us, on moderate terms, from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m., on the six Sundays, extending from July 28 to Sept. 1. The services at that place will be conducted, we hope, by the Revs. E. W. Lummis, M.A. (Warrington), J. C. Street (Shrewsbury), W. G. Tarrant, B.A. (London), and others.

At Ramsay, the services will be held in in the Palace, a large hall near the centre of the town. The Rev. Charles Roper, B.A. (Manchester), will officiate on July 21 and 28, and the Revs. A. H. Dolphin (Leigh), and W. R. Shanks (Manchester) on successive Sundays.

In connection with these services, we are particularly anxious to secure assistance from friends visiting, or who may be induced to visit, either of these seaside resorts. Properly organised choirs are, we fear, out of our reach, but it may be possible to find a sufficient number of ladies and gentlemen, singers and players, from our churches in Wales, the Midlands, and the North, to provide us with the necessary musical leadership during the six Sundays in each place.

I shall be glad to hear from those who may be willing to help us, on one or more Sundays, and on any conditions.

W. R. Shanks, Hon. Sec.,
Missionary Conference,

Manchester.

[The Rev. C. Roper also writes inviting offers of help at Ramsay. His address for the next three weeks will be The Tower, Brookhill-road, Ramsay, I.O.M.—Ed. Inq.]

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN JOYNER.

We regret to record the death of Mr. John Joyner, which occurred at his residence at Cheltenham on July 2. Deceased, who was sixty-eight years of age, and seemed to enjoy good health for his time of life, left home about a month ago for a short holiday at Bodmin. Owing to sudden indisposition, he was brought home on Thursday, June 27, and developed bronchitis and pneumonia, to which he succumbed early on the following Tuesday morning. In his young days he was for many years associated with the Cheltenham School of Art both as a student and tutor, and gained several medals for artistic work. Subsequently he opened his photographic business in High-street, where he remained for some thirty years, successfully combining art with high-class photography. He retired from active participation in the business about three years ago. A Liberal in politics, he took a keen interest in social and political questions, and was recognised as having considerable ability as a debater. His death deprives the congregation of Bayshill Unitarian Church of another of their old and valued members. He had been associated with the congregation for over fifty years, and for many years had rendered excellent service to the church as secretary. He retired from the post two years ago, and it was hoped the church might have had the advantage of his wise counsel for many years to come. He was a man of strict integrity, one who had a very high sense of his duty, and, as such, he will be gratefully remembered by a large circle of acquaintances. To him the principles he professed were matters of profound conviction, and in bygone years suffered much persecution on behalf of his Faith, when bigotry and intolerance prevailed to a greater extent in the town than at the present time; and he advocated it with an admirable consistency and devotion. He was much respected by all who knew him. He leaves a wife, three sons, and a daughter. The interment took place at Leckhampton Churchyard on Friday, the vicar, the Rev. Clifford Aston, and the Unitarian minister the Rev. J. Fisher Jones, officiating.

A MINISTER'S LIFE AND WORK.*

BY THE REV. J. PAGE HOPPS.

. . . . IF you are the stuff that true prophets are made of you are idealists. I congratulate you and I commiserate you. You may have a hard time of it. The big world is not idealistic; it is a money-making machine, and, even though the men who tread the wheel love it not, they must tread, and act as though they too were money-making machines. But do not break your hearts over it. Locked as a secret in every breast is the longing for ideals. Trust that; appeal to that; gratify that. Dream with the hidden dream. Let the tired man, let the jaded woman, dream. It is at least as good as a fairy tale to a child. I should not mind if they called the church the House of Dreams. Live in the Great God's fairy-land and dream; and tell men this—that all God's dreams come true. As a help in this direction, steer straight for joy and hopefulness in your services. Be as serious as you like, but strike the note of joy. I remember a story about that blithe minister, Paxton Hood, who, one bright Sunday morning, had to preach in a strange chapel where an old deacon gave out the hymns. To his dismay, the good old man solemnly announced the 214th hymn, and read the first two lines:

> My thoughts on awful subjects roll,
> Damnation and the dead.

Whereupon Paxton Hood got up and said, "No, dear friends, our thoughts don't roll that way at all this morning. Let us sing to the praise and glory of God, hymn 14:

> Come let us join our cheerful songs,
> With angels round the throne."

That better thought has spread far and wide since his day; and now, on every hand, there is a most consoling sign of the times in the drift away from the old savageries, and even a drift away from dogmas of all kinds, to practical humanity. One saw and felt it at our late International meetings in London; but it is manifest in all the churches. I remember the time when the question whether Theodore Parker's works should be sold by the Unitarians divided them into two excited camps. It would be impossible now. What we all want is the enthusiasm of humanity. Keep eyes and heart on that. It is your bright morning and evening star.

You see I am speaking to you as idealists, as men accustomed to go up to the Mount of God; but you will have to translate the golden ideal into a homely real. "See then," saith He, "that you make all things according to the pattern that has been shown you in the Mount." You will have to concern yourselves with very simple things, with things insignificant and common-place, that will, perhaps, look poor and dull when you remember the golden visions on the Mount. But still the pattern will be there, and you must work by it; and, in the classroom, in the teacher's meeting, in the miner's cottage, in the mean little garret, in the infirmary ward, in the public meeting, when passions may burn like fire, or at the chapel on dull wet days when nobody may seem to care, the voice must haunt you: "See that you make all things according to the pattern that was shown you in the Mount."

In harmony with this, and to help it, try to be mercifully interested in every one. Bear with the athlete in the world of business; he has to fight the battle of life, and you must make allowances for his habits, his attitudes and his moods. Love the young; they all respond to love. See the beauty and the pathos of the aged. And sympathise with all. Take an interest in men and women, and not only in books. Your best library is in the open air and in life. If you are interested in politics, keep special questions out of the church; but play the man in the open arena. No prophet can afford to sell his soul and body to a congregation for, say, £200 a year. But, in the church, discuss no disputed political questions; and when disputed questions divide men, reserve the church for lessons of charity and pity and the brotherhood.

And now, what is your real work? Well, your work is many-sided, and I, at least, am not the man to deny that. One of my own greatest helps has been that I have had variety in my life: interest in all human struggles, at home and abroad; interest in foreign peoples, members of the great human brotherhood; interest in politics, in sociology, in business. All this helps to keep a minister bright and broad and many-sided, and well informed and fresh. But, at the heart of all, there is one thing. What is that? Ah, but it is such a simple thing; and the secret is so obvious and so small. It is all told in the one word, Sympathy; or, if you prefer it—Pity, or Humanity, or Love. Everything must be determined by that, and everything can be determined by that—politics, sociology, business, everything; for everywhere the key that unlocks all doors, the magic word that laughs at foreign tongues, and makes even all prayers one, is Sympathy, Humanity, Love. We are miserable for want of sympathy; we quarrel; we are envious; we build up barriers; we misunderstand one another, or conspire to take advantage of one another, for want of sympathy. And it is the one main business of the minister of religion to tell the world that—to show why it is feverish and miserable, and quarrelsome, and wicked.

Nor is it necessary that, in doing this, the minister of religion should ever use his pulpit for one side—for the men against the masters, or the masters against the men; for England against the foreigner, or the foreigner against England. Outside, as a man and a citizen, he may take a side, and ought to take a side, and fight like a good soldier against what he specifically feels is wrong; but in worship he must forget sides, and think of principles; forget what divides, and think of what might unite; forget the quarrel, and think of the cure.

Sympathy is Heaven's heal-all for every-one of the world's maladies. It is the real instructor too; for it unbolts closed doors, and opens the lips of the heart, and liberates the passion-bound explanations of reason. The preacher of sympathy therefore stands in the highest place. He holds the keys of business, of politics, of society. He is the true prophet, whether as forth-speaker for God or foreteller of things to come. Ah, my brothers, you might be angels in this world of fighting beasts or competing men. You stand on the highest ground. Keep there, and be faithful unto death!

What then? Does this mean that you are only to be poetic, dainty, artistic, and the sayer of pleasant things? What a misreading this, of all I have said! Did not Christ say—"Ye shall be hated of all men for my sake"? and did he not himself come as the angel with the flaming sword—and with the whip of cords? Who was it that drove out the desecrators of the temple? Who was it that denounced the Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, and pictured the whited sepulchre, and even flung out his threat of the damnation of hell? It was the "gentle Jesus," it was the "beloved son," it was the "prince of peace." So you, my brothers, set as watchmen on the mount of the Lord, must not be deterred from calling things by their right names, and from holding the mirror up to nature; "to show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure." But it must all be done, and all men must see that it is done, out of sympathy, from compassion not passion, because you pity, because you burn with the enthusiasm of humanity, because you want to make the Lord's Prayer true.

But the mountain will burn with fire, and you will be the angel with the flaming sword, only where the need is great. You will love best the green pastures and the still waters, and will sigh for them even when you must resign them; and, for the same reason that you leave them, you will return to them, for the sake of sympathy. As a rule you can live by the green pastures and the still waters, and help the people there, or lead the people thither from the dusty road. And this work comes first; not the soldier but the lover, not the scholar but the friend. And, as to that last, it is well that the people shall know something of the "Higher Criticism," the composite nature of the Old Testament, the precise number of Isaiahs who contributed to the Book which bears that name, or the present condition of the controversy concerning the authorship of the Gospel according to St. John: but think of this, that for once the people are in a state of mind to need, or perhaps even to bear this, they twenty times want help, encouragement, and the lifting up of the life.

I once met somewhere a very homely rustic poem on this subject. It told of a solemn preacher who discoursed about the Pentateuch and belaboured the Jews.

> But never a word he uttered
> To the living folk in sight.
> His thoughts were all for the ancients,
> Far back in the world's long flight.

Then he complained that the congregation were fidgety or fell asleep: but a good old-fashioned deacon got up and explained matters:—

> We're plain, hard-working people,
> And we're busy through the week;
> So, when we come to meeting,
> It's a resting spell we seek.
> We're tired with our toils and troubles,
> And weary with fighting sin:
> We need something good and hearty
> For our souls so worn and thin.
> But what do we get? Why, mostly
> A hash of stale old views,
> Too musty and dry for feeding
> Us hungry folks in the pews.
> Give us something fresh and wholesome
> That'll help us on our way;
> Tell us how to live and prosper
> In the conflicts of to-day.

* From an address given at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester on welcoming into the ministry students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College who had completed their course.

I'm sure if the blessed Master
Was a-preaching here in your stead,
He'd be trying to help the living,
'Sted o' mauling of the dead.

So if you want to keep us wakeful,
Just give us the Gospel news;
And don't for the sake o' the living,
Keep a-worrying them old Jews!

I think the old homely deacon was right. The pressure of daily life is constant and keen, and the area of that pressure increases, and the time is very much "out of joint," and it often hard to love your fellow man—or even to forgive him; and so, when the blessed Sunday morning comes, and the man turns his face, or the woman turns her face, to the little chapel, away from the multitude, away from the authoritative helper of souls, away from the music and the bright company, and goes along the lonely road to the few who are gathered together in the name, the need is plain.

Perhaps the road of the week has been unusually dusty and trying, or it has been beset with briars and weeds, and there has been the "contradiction of sinners," or temptation has been strong, and has perhaps been given in to, or one here and there has been disappointed in his fellow-creatures, and faith is at a low ebb, or a dear friend has vanished, or a little child; and even the sunshine is a kind of mockery; and the poor soul can hardly drag itself to the place of meeting; or there are young people who are making the grave discovery that life is a campaign and not a pleasure party; or the bread-winner is beginning to feel that strength is ebbing; or the mother is wondering what will happen if she should go; or the sins and miseries of the world, and the passions of men, and the madness of war, and the fury of the people, and the burning of hate, and the blaze of selfishne ss, have made the believer in God bitter and dull, and the mocking demon, beside the guardian angel, gets his chance, and croaks, "Hath God said?" or, perhaps, "Curse God and die!" And all that may be in the humblest little meeting-place to which you may go. Remember it; and, when each Sunday comes, ask God and the angels to open your eyes, and touch your hearts, and give you a real cure of souls.

And now, come in! "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" Come in; but to a long campaign. The world chooses from its own standard. Choose you from yours. The world wants wealth and honours and victory over competitors. And you? Be clear about it to-day. Then do not flinch. You may never find the harvest field that even the good minister may desire. What of it? The man sent into the desert may be the well-beloved son. Fight you the tempter there! And be sure of this, that no one knows—that no one can ever know—what he is doing. It will often seem doubtful to you; and you will say to your soul, "And is this all?" Be comforted! God and the angels know; and the record in Great Mother Nature's book is exact, indelible, and sure.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Nineteenth Century contains a singularly apt article by Mr. Thomas Shaw, M.P., in which he points out "The 'Durham' Road to Peace"—of course alluding to the now universally applauded policy of Lord Durham in regard to the Canadian difficulty of sixty years ago. The quotations given by Mr. Shaw from Lord Durham's report are startlingly parallel to descriptions of affairs in South Africa; and no serious readers can fail to be impressed with the arguments drawn from Canada's experience to the case of the Cape. Mr. Frederick Greenwood writes appealing to the great missionary societies to hold their hand from doing mischief in China, especially at present. He remembers the enthusiastic spirit that will dare all to spread the Gospel, though he is evidently not at one with it. But he points to many instances in which the missionaries have quite unnecessarily flung themselves against the ordinary customs and ideals of the Chinese people, and some of his statements show the pioneers of the Cross in anything but a lowly and Christian mood. The article serves to bring home to the reader a sense of the great problem which lies before the world, west and east, in regard to this race, upon whom so many injuries have been inflicted in the name of civilisation. Professor Mahaffy writes with the gloomiest forebodings respecting the decay of the Protestant squirearchy in Ireland. Dr. Guinness Rogers sketches the condition and progress of "Dissent in the Victorian Era," and naturally claims that the recent drawing together of Evangelical Nonconformists into the Free Church Council is a symptom fraught with great possibilities. There are three other articles of special attractiveness, for us—namely, the Rev. E. Ledger's on "The Recent New Star in Perseus," written rather for people who want their science in the most elementary form; "The Cause of the Children," a defence of School Board education by the Countess of Warwick; and Mr. Herbert Paul's sketch of the late Bishop Creighton.

The Contemporary presents fewer items calling for mention here. An anonymous article laudatory of Lord Rosebery's foreign policy opens the Review—the author's name might, or might not, lend weight to his view. Mr. R. E. Hughes gives a careful and instructive comparison of German and English schools, and his article is well worth the attention of parents and teachers. The Rev. D. S. Cairns, in giving the second part of his essay on "Christianity and Public Life," insists on interpreting the apocalyptic passages in the New Testament as symbolising a future age of social progress and regeneration; and he will not concede that the "prophecies" alluded to are either pointed at a "spiritual" kingdom, as some interpret, or are to be regarded as the glow through Christian media of Jewish Messianic hopes and expectations, now of historic interest merely. A very pressing problem is dealt with in the Rev. J. T. Darragh's article on the "Liquor Trade in the Transvaal." He advocates state monopoly in drink.

The Monthly Review is eminently readable, but of general interest rather than in our special line. Mr. J. B. C. Kershaw analyses the now dead Education Bill, especially as regards technical education. He finds it a good Bill, and supposes that most people unconnected with existing institutions (e.g. School Boards) would vote for it. Possibly; but do we really think that experience in connection with education is a disqualification for judging an Education Bill?

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SPEECH DAY.

THE first year's work of Willaston School, Nantwich, founded by the late Philip Barker, was happily celebrated on Friday, July 4, which was a glorious summer day. A goodly company of visitors gathered together, in response to the invitation of the Governors and Head-master, and saw the new school-buildings with all their admirable arrangements and the beautiful grounds under the pleasantest conditions.

At the time of the stone-laying by Sir John Brunner, in September, 1899, we published a drawing of the proposed new buildings, and the general aspect of the completed structure (in which Mr. Barker's former residence, in the midst of its grounds, remains as the Head-master's house) more than fulfils the promise of the plans. There is ample room for extension and further equipment as the school grows. A school chapel has yet to be built, and at present the carpenters' benches occupy one end of the fine gymnasium until a separate workshop is built. The Head-master spoke also of the need of further provision for science teaching; and while the Nantwich brine swimming-bath is now reserved for the boys for two hours a week, he also dreams of a swimming-bath for the school; but yet one may say that for a beginning the school is very completely furnished. The buildings, and the cricket and football fields may be seen from the train, on the right of the line between Crewe and Nantwich.

Speech Day on Friday week was devoted to an inspection of the School, before and after a meeting, held in the gymnasium, at which addresses were given by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Chairman of the Governors, and Mr. Guy Lewis, M.A., the Head-master. Mr. Lewis explained that in the first year it had been thought best not to ask the boys to take any active part in the proceedings, but that in future they would naturally add to the interest and pleasure of the occasion by contributing perhaps dramatic representations, and certainly recitations and music.

Among those present were, in addition to the Chairman and Head-master, the Revs. Dr. Vance Smith, H. E. Dowson, J. E. Odgers, P. M. Higginson, H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, A. Bennett, E. A. Maley, W. F. Turland, J. Lloyd Jones, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. C. S. Roundell, W. Colfox, D. Martineau, W. Long, Charles W. Jones, G. H. Leigh, F. Monks, A. W. Worthington, Russell Scott, J. H. Brooks, H. P. Greg, G. W. R. Wood, John Harwood, J. W. Beaumont, Richard D. Holt, and C. Sydney Jones; also the assistant masters, the Rev. J. H. Woods, M.A., Mr. H. L. Jones, B.A., and Mr. A. D. Tobler and the boys. Letters of regret for absence had been received from the Earl of Carlisle, Mr. Justice Wills, Sir John Brunner, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, Sir Thomas and Lady Frost, the Misses Martineau, Messrs. W. Rathbone, D. Ainsworth, J. Allanson Picton, and others.

The CHAIRMAN, in the course of his address, said that they had undertaken a great task in starting a new public school. It was a daring thing to do, justified only by the special aim they had in view. He hoped that a tradition would grow up round the place which would give to Willaston an honourable name among public schools. The peculiarity of their trust would not, he feared, add to the popularity of the school in the world at large. Their aim was not only to give a thorough intellectual and moral training, but also to train the spiritual and religious nature on principles not recognised in other public schools. Other schools were connected with the Church of England or some special religious denomination, but Willaston was founded on a broader basis. Its aim was to give religious teaching without any test implied or demanded from scholar or teacher. It is hoped that the boys would gain a thorough knowledge of the Bible, and that the first elements of religious life and of a devout spirit would be nurtured in them, without any indoctrination in the tenets of a particular sect. There had been schools before with such an ideal; but private schools could not last or found a tradition of training, as could be done by a public school with a strong foundation; and that was what they hoped from Willaston. Mr. Barker had laid a good foundation, but for the buildings and other preparations they had been obliged to encroach on the funds he had left, and they had to appeal for further subscriptions. Over £10,000 had been given, and the Governors were now asking for another £10,000 to complete the endowment of the school. In conclusion, Mr. Steinthal spoke of the character of the training they hoped to give, both on the classical and the modern side, emphasising the need of general culture for commercial as for professional life, and expressed the Governors' sense of good fortune in the teaching staff they had secured, in which various training schools were happily represented.

The HEAD-MASTER then gave an address in which he first drew the attention of the visitors to a number of special points in the equipment of the school, and told of the experience of the first year of work, and then spoke at length of the general aims and ideal of the school. This latter part of the address we are happy to be able to append in full. Willaston, he said, had been dedicated at the stone-laying twenty-two months ago to the pursuit of learning and the service of truth. They had issued a plain unvarnished prospectus, but they might claim to have started with a complete educational and domestic equipment. They had twenty-seven boys on their roll, but two had been absent through illness, and twenty-five had been their effective strength. They were prepared for twice that number, and had four resident and five visiting masters. He spoke very warmly of the services of the resident masters, of whom Mr. Woods, the mathematical master, had charge also of the religious ministrations on week-days and Sundays. Mr. Jones, who was an accomplished musician, had already achieved admirable results in their congregational singing, and in the winter months music was a regular part of their school life. Mr. Jones has also been largely responsible for the discipline of the school and had charge of the athletics. If as a large family or social organism they had worked through the first two terms without friction it was due to him, and in the gymnasium and the playing fields they also had good results to show, promising to hold their own against the old-established schools of the country. In science teaching they had begun with physics and botany. Mr. Tobler, of Berne University, who was to teach French and German on the conversational system, had also shown great capacity in quickening the interest of the boys in nature, and in the large upper room devoted to the botany class were to be seen collections of plants made by the boys, which were well worth inspection. Practical gardening was also a regular part of the school work, and each boy had his own allotment, in which the results of trained teaching and diligent care can be seen.

As to the arrangements of the school Mr. Lewis called attention to the fine set of class-rooms, light and airy and all on the west front, so that the boys could have the right light on their work. The library was a beautiful room, where the boys had immediate access to the books; the management was entirely in their hands, and its good order was greatly to be commended. The dining-hall was also a feature in the school, appealing to the æsthetic sense. The dormitories were on the open system, with no vestige of cubicles. He spoke warmly of the great energy, high character and enthusiasm of Miss Wicksteed, the matron. The head-master's enthusiasm both for the work and the play of the school evoked a hearty response from the audience, and not least from the boys who occupied the long line of the carpenters' benches at the end of the gymnasium; it augured well for the future of the school.

THE HEAD-MASTER'S IDEALS.

Having spoken, as above described, of the arrangements and work of the school, Mr. Lewis proceeded:—

It would not be fair to allow you to disperse without alluding to one or two of the general considerations that guide us in arranging the work here. It is, firstly, our duty to turn out good citizens. Survey the state of the country from whatever political point of view you may, you will all agree that England still has need of men who will bring to the consideration of public affairs freshness of judgment, high moral tone, and sincere desire to cherish the permanent elements in our national character and civilisation. For a supply of such men the country is entitled to look to the public schools. We are conscious of our duty in this respect. Our boys are drawn from families, and our school is administered by men and has received the support of men who have rendered splendid services to their municipalities and to the state. We have to send out into the world boys who will, in their turn, be capable of such service. So the school must be impressed upon the boys as an organism, something more than an aggregate of individuals as an organism making a first charge on the wisdom and devotion and energy of its members. Happily, I can say that something of this kind has already been done. Already the school idea is evolving, and traditions are accumulating. The idea has been rapidly seized by the boys, and they have already a sense of the school as a corporation, with its differentiation of rank, its diverse allotment of tasks, and the moral obligation of the ideal it embodies.

Secondly, we think a boy properly educated at school should on leaving automatically enter the Freemasonry of culture wherever it exists. He should have ability to decide what is best in society and desire to cleave to it, and for the freshness and purity of his own mind he should be welcome as an acolyte therein. He should not be a creature without intellectual aim, prone to degenerate public amusements. It is not a question of small fossil coteries where, as Byron said, "pedantry gulls folly" and men talk the jargon of the arts. When Ben Jonson wrote the laws for the Apollo Tavern, he inscribed on the Tables "Eruditi, urbani, hilares, honesti adsciscuntor." I think when a boy leaves school he should have his mind steadfastly set in one direction and draw where learned wit and honourable gaiety abound.

Further, it is our duty to cultivate the intellectual appreciations as a resource for a man in middle life and in declining years. I know the fascination of professional and commercial life, their first ardors and the enthusiasm of acquisition. But there comes a time when the marrow cools. The cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches appear, and often the man turns in upon himself and the resources of his mind to save himself from staleness and despair. We ought to look forward against such a time as that, and instead of being purely materialistic in our aims we should cherish the æsthetic and artistic feelings of the human heart.

Lastly, we have to equip our boys for a particular career. But how far can we go in this direction? We mean only that for the last two years a boy is at school he should know exactly what aim in life he has in view, and an equally clear grasp of the means by which he is to realise the end. If he is destined for a profession he should be properly impressed with its dignity, he should know the qualifications that will be demanded of him, and the nature of the tests to which he must submit. If he is for commerce he must have some insight into the economic and social conditions of his time, and the place occupied by producer, distributor, consumer in the complex fabric of the modern state. If he is to enter a manufactory or engineering works where the forces of Nature are manipulated for the service of man, he should know what the forces of Nature are, and the various ways in which human wit have made them subservient to human needs. This may seem an unambitious programme, especially to those who have the siren song of technical education ringing in their ears, and have forgotten to tie themselves to the mast. As schoolmasters we are ever met with a demand to "specialise" the boys entrusted to our care. I am afraid of this state of things. For the juvenile and undeveloped intellect specialisation is sterilisation. Of course the attack has been focussed on the dead languages. Greek has gone the primrose way, and Latin seems doomed. I do not now deplore the annual diminution in the number of those who study Latin and Greek to acquire their literatures as an intellectual possession. If I felt that the parent who asks for his boy not yet fourteen to abandon Latin and take up German had Lessing's "Laocoon," or Goethe's "Faust" in his mind's eye, I would not deplore it at all. But I have not that consolation. I only feel that years that might have been given to general intellectual training are being subtracted for narrower purposes. It will be an evil day when the mechanical subjects displace in the curriculum of boys under seventeen the stricter studies which, if they did not yield a gaudy measurable result, enforced consecutive analytical thought, close concentrated attention and alert wary going, while they purified and perpetuated the canon of taste.

This seems reactionary, but we are not among those who wish "the dust on antique time to be unswept." We have the broadest aims. As schoolmasters we have taken for our motto the Roman poet's saying, "Homo sum: humani nihil a me alienum puto." We are men and we think nothing in human nature outside the scope of our work. We want to be of practical and efficient help to the boys in all their activities throughout the day. I simply ask that you should leave us the time in which to perform our proper functions, to enlarge the understanding, to kindle the imagination, to refine the taste and fix the mind upon essential things.

At the conclusion of the meeting tea was served in the dining-hall.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION CENTENARY MEETINGS.

THE centenary of this Association was celebrated on Tuesday, July 2, at Newport, I.W. The proceedings began with luncheon in the Masonic Hall. Mr. J. Cogan Conway (President) presided, and the company included the Rev. C. C. Coe (Bournemouth), T. Lloyd Thomas (Nottingham), F. W. Stanley, H. S. Solly (Bridport), E. C. Bennett (Southampton), C. A. Hoddinott (Chichester), E. S. Anthony (Poole), C. E. Pike (Newport), Dr. Cunningham Brown, Messrs. Isaacs (Bournemouth), T. Bond (Portsmouth), H. Blessley, F. Pinnock, J. G. Pinnock, F. E. Whitcher, Mesdames Leslie Chatfeild-Clarke, Solly, Shepard, Misses Clarke, Spencer, Carter, Evelegh and E. A. Evelegh, Pinnock and M. A. Pinnock, Minns, and Pike.

The toast of "The King and Royal Family" having been honoured, the PRESIDENT proposed "The British and Foreign Unitarian Association," which, he said, was worthy of all support.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY responding conveyed the good wishes of the Central Association for their friends in the South.

The Rev. C. E. PIKE proposed "The Southern Association," which was founded at Newport, July 23, 1801. On June 28, 1815, the Southern Association Fund was founded; and the Southern Unitarian Society, which was founded for the diffusion of literature, was subsequently amalgamated with the former. Responses to the toast were made by Mr. COGAN CONWAY, Miss SPENCER, Mr. H. BLESSLEY, and Mr. F. PINNOCK. "The Western Union" was similarly honoured, on the proposal of the Rev. E. S. ANTHONY, and the Rev. H. S. SOLLY responded. "The Hosts" and "The Press" were also toasted.

ANNUAL REPORT.

At the business meeting which followed, Mr. F. PINNOCK (hon. sec.) read the annual report, which, after expressing thankfulness for a century of good work by the Association, referred to the death of Queen Victoria, and proceeded:—

Saddened as our nation has been by the events of one of the most terrible and disastrous wars in which our country has ever been engaged, it will surely be the hope and prayer of this Association that the reign of our present illustrious Sovereign may be brightened by the return of the blessings of peace; that the principles so long cherished and fearlessly advocated by this Association and all other Unitarian Associations may be still further advanced; that the great cause of education and the pursuit of peaceful industries may receive still greater encouragement; and that the great principle of the brotherhood of man may be not simply a high ideal, but to a larger extent become a glorious reality.

The Twentieth Century Fund had reached £1,070, which was now invested. The retirement of Mr. H. Blessley from the hon. secretaryship, which he had held for eighteen years, had been accepted with much regret. Regretful mention is made also of the death of Mrs. T. Chatfeild Clarke, a kind and generous helper of the cause. The reports of the congregations were in the main encouraging, but the Weymouth movement has been given up for the present. A week's special "Mission" has been arranged to be held in the autumn at Southampton.

Miss SPENCER read the Treasurer's report, which showed an income of £252, and a balance in hand of £47. Reports on Sunday-school work, Postal Mission, and from the Advisory Committee, were also presented and adopted. The officers were re-appointed for the ensuing year, with the substitution of Mr. F. Pinnock as Secretary in place of Mr. H. Blessley, who becomes a Vice-President.

It was resolved that a public meeting should be held, when convenient, on the occasion of the quarterly meetings of the Executive Committee.

A discussion took place on a proposal by the Rev. E. S. ANTHONY to reconstitute the Association as a "Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches"; ultimately the matter was referred to the Committee to consider and report.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP (formerly minister at Newport) said:—For 100 years that Association had stood for something very precious. In Palestine, the land from which the highest inspiration had come, he went about feeling the source of inspiration had gone; it was exceedingly depressing, but those ideas and principles, for which the prophet of Nazareth lived and died, were in the world still. One felt in coming back to the land which is now seeking to translate into actual life the great facts which the prophets were inspired to teach, that they should endeavour to get at the real truth of the words of Jesus. The feeling of of perfect trust in a supreme power, and a living sympathy with every member of the human family made them one with men apart from their creeds. They had an indifference to mere wealth for the sake of a luxurious life. They must be faithful to the ideals of Jesus. If the nation as a whole were not, England would certainly decline. As Unitarians they lived for the highest things the human mind could grasp or the heart could love.

Tea was provided in the schoolroom, to which a goodly number sat down, and a religious service was held in the evening, an eloquent sermon being preached by the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, of Nottingham.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.

ANNUAL SPEECH-DAY.

THE annual prize-giving took place on Friday, June 29, at the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, in the presence of a numerous gathering. The deputation from the Presbyterian Board consisted of Messrs. G. H. Clennell (secretary), Frank Preston, Harold Baily, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, B.A., and the Rev. G. D. Hicks, M.A., Ph.D., the three latter of whom also officiated as examiners, in conjunction with Mr. Talfourd Ely, M.A., of Lendon, and the Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A., of Strasburg, a former professor of the Presbyterian College. The Rev. Dr. Hicks presided.

The CHAIRMAN, in an eloquent address, congratulated the college on a good year's work, and conveyed the sincere gratitude of the Presbyterian Board to the Principal and Professors for their untiring devotion. After offering some remarks on the papers he had examined, Dr. Hicks proceeded to emphasise the privilege of study in such a college, and urged the students who would still remain to make the best use of this golden opportunity. He pointed to the career of the late accomplished scholar and scientific investigator, Viriamu Jones, the first Vice-Chancellor of the infant Welsh University, who, though of humblest birth, had already at forty-five won a high position. They could not all claim his genius, but they might emulate his zeal.

Addressing the students who were leaving College, Dr. Hicks said:—You are entering upon your calling at a critical period of our country's history. We stand, so to speak, at the present moment, at a parting of the ways, on the confines of two worlds, one dead, the other waiting to be born. It is hardly possible as yet to predict the course of coming events, or to discern how the incipient forces, now emerging into prominence, will ultimately shape themselves. So far as we, who are in the midst of the movement, can decipher it, there would seem to be a sharper division between two great epochs of time than is usually the case. The nineteenth century has passed away, and carried off with it most of the personalities whose exertions and ideals have made it for ever memorable. Hardly a commanding voice is left—hardly a single figure of such pre-eminence and authority as naturally to take the lead in the onward march of civilisation. "A common greyness silvers everything; all in the twilight, you and I alike." And the consequence is that these are not heroic days; they are the days of the so-called "practical men," when great ideas are at a discount, and merely commercial aims absorb the interests and minds of our citizens. It is not so much an age of doubt; I sometimes almost wish it were. I certainly wisb that we had still the strong, manly criticism of a Huxley or a Tyndall to face, for that would at least, awaken us from our lethargy, and compel us to bring all our powers of reason to bear in order to maintain and fortify the religious principles for which we stand. No, ours is not an age of honest doubt; it is, for the most part, too languid to be that. Such negative criticism as is current amongst us is too faint-hearted and weak to trouble us over much; it is not penetrating enough to drive us back upon ourselves, and to force us to realise the inner strength of those primary truths which are the ground and basis of our Christianity. In large measure, the people of our time are too indifferent, too careless in regard to spiritual themes either to believe or to disbelieve strongly; and are content to pass through life without coming into serious contact with spiritual problems at all. This makes, of course, the position of the Christian Ministry all the more difficult, all the more arduous; but it only increases and intensifies, surely, the need to which he has to minister. For, in such a state of things, it is his business to awaken his fellow-men to a sense of the nobility and grandeur of the spiritual side of life; to call forth the yearning for those loftier and purer ideals, which give to manhood's nature all its worth and value. In such a period of transition as I have indicated, one important part, at all events, of the religious teacher's function is to prepare the way for the next great step in the history of our civilisation. He has to keep the torch of spiritual interest alight, so to speak, in the midst of mediocrity, until the man of genius shall arise, who will interpret the new ideals for the coming century, and enable us humbler workers in the vineyard to see and to realise them distinctly. Then, once more, we shall advance swiftly forward; then we shall, I hope, all of us become enthusiastic in view of the promise that lies before our humanity. Some of you quoted for me the well-known maxim of Carlyle, that the history of the world is the biography of its great men. Yes, to a large extent, that is so; but it is also true that part of that history is made up of the biographies of its lesser inmates, and that you and I can contribute our little mite to its progress. From our experience of human evolution, we may rest assured that the new leader will appear when the world is ready for him; but, in the meantime, in a season of dulness and sterility, we have simply to be true and faithful, and to do our best to keep the souls of men alert for the message of the future prophet, when he shall arise. For in this, as in most other things, the law holds good that the demand creates the supply; and when men and women begin to call for a God-inspired leader, he will come. How, then, shall we best fulfil a mission of this kind? We shall never do it by appealing simply to the feelings and emotions and sentiments of men. The hearts of men need, indeed, to be touched, and one object of our preaching is certainly to arouse the affections and sympathies of our hearers for all that is good and beautiful and true. But even in order to do that, we must know and understand and appreciate these things; we must think about them, we must take the trouble and pains to find out the grounds on which they rest, we must see for ourselves the reasons why they are good and beautiful and true. There is no other means by which the life of a Christian minister can be either satisfying to himself or serviceable to others. As theologians, we believe that the physical universe, and human life, and human society express and reveal the working of that mighty Spirit, Who is the Mind of nature and the Father of men. And when we remember what the century has been that expired last year—that it included the scientific labours of a Faraday, a Herschel, and a Darwin; that amongst its products were the great literary monuments of a Wordsworth and a Coleridge, a Tennyson and a Browning, a Carlyle and a Ruskin; that it numbered amongst its social workers a Cobden and a Bright and a Gladstone; that amongst its divines, it reckoned a Newman, a Pusey, a Caird, and a Martineau—we must own it to be a simple absurdity to imagine that, with the scope of nature and history and life enriched and expanded for us, as by these minds it has been, the field of theology can remain what it was, or be for us the narrow and confined region it sometimes appeared to our forefathers. We at least, as religious teachers, must enter into this great inheritance; we at least must endeavour to share in the fruits of intellectual conquest already won for our race. In our time especially, the yoke of God's service is not to be assumed on lighter terms than these. Now, it has been the aim and object of the College in which you have spent the last three years, to put into your hands the means by which you may be enabled to make these higher gifts of culture part and parcel of the things you love and cherish and live for; part and parcel of the equipment by which you may aid and elevate and ennoble the lives of your fellow-men. I know it is often the custom to explain the want of glow that is sometimes manifested by an educated preacher, through the suggestion that his preparatory studies have deadened and damped out his native fire. If any one will show me a single instance in which fervour has been quenched by culture, and he who might have been the prophet has been converted into the dull pedant, then I will recognise the force of the plea. But we may be pretty confident no such instance will be forthcoming. Often have I known of cases in which too little light has made of men, who once were bright and interesting, dreary and monotonous preachers, but never have I known of men, whose minds were continually open to fresh and new intellectual influences, becoming less effective men in the pulpit thereby. In bidding you, then, on behalf of the College, farewell, and in wishing you a hearty god-speed in the departments of labour you are about to enter, my heart's desire and prayer for you is that, wherever you may be, you may still remain students in the best sense of that word, students of this great Universe of God; that you may be constantly rewarded in your efforts to lead others to appreciate that universe, and to live in the way in which they can appreciate it; and that, in your various centres of activity, you may often think with love and affection of the little College that sent you out on your life's journey, and of the teachers who have been devoting thought and toil and endeavour to make you men of whom they could be proud.

Mr. HAROLD BAILY (Examiner in Literature), the Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR (Examiner in Ecclesiastical History and other subjects), and Mr. FRANK PRESTON having also spoken, Mr. G. H. CLENNELL, secretary of the Presbyterian Board, read the following letter from the Rev. T. L. Marshall, his predecessor in that office during many years:—

The old Secretary of the Presbyterian Board sends his affectionate greeting to his dear friends, the ministers of Carmarthen and the neighbourhood and all the former students and others—by no means forgetting the ladies also—whom he addressed with so much pleasure for so many successive years at the annual examinations. He hears with much gratification accounts of the increasing prosperity of the dear old college and desires to express his warm interest in the present students although unknown to him. Welsh students have generally been distinguished for their love of learning and their unselfish devotion to the work of their Great Master; and the old secretary desires to express the earnest hope that they fully appreciate the advantages they enjoy and will do their best to perpetuate and, if possible, increase the reputation of their Alma Mater. Semper Floreat!

Midsummer, 1901.

Mr. TALFOURD ELY (Examiner in Classics) and the Rev. PHILEMON MOORE (Examiner in the New Testament, &c.), having also given addresses, Principal EVANS read the prize list, and leaving certificates were given to seven students, with a certificate of honour to another.

Further addresses were given by Professor JONES, Professor WEATHERALL, the Revs. W. C. JENKINS, W. S. JONES, and L. JAMES; the last moving a resolution of greeting to the Rev. T. L. Marshall and thanks for his message. This was carried with acclamation, and the meeting closed with prayer.

THE MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

THE Missionary Conference had its annual meetings in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, under the presidency of the Rev. CHARLES ROPER, B.A., on Thursday, July 4. A "Communion Service" was conducted at 10 A.M., by the Revs. G. A. Payne and J. M. Bass, M.A., and a "Devotional Service" at 10.30 A.M., by the President. The business meeting commenced at 11 A.M., when the President delivered an address, in which he emphasised the relation between belief and character, and contended that the true Unitarian must be tremendously in earnest about the conversion of other men to his way of thinking.

It was announced by the SECRETARY that arrangements were being made for religious services being held at Ramsay, I.O.M., and Colwyn Bay, during July and August. For this purpose The Palace had been secured at Ramsay, and the Pier Pavilion at Colwyn Bay. There was a strong feeling that the missionary spirit must be kept alive, and that the religious needs of our friends who spend their holidays in these seaside resorts must not be overlooked.

In the afternoon a paper on "Missionary Methods" was read by the Rev. W. C. HALL, M.A. It dealt with the difficulties of establishing new causes, and advocated a whole-hearted support being given to those engaged in the work.

A discussion was opened by the Rev. J. A. PEARSON, in which a number of members took part.

The members had tea together, and afterwards spent a very pleasant social evening under the chairmanship of the Rev. CHARLES ROPER.

The President for 1901-2 is the Rev. Henry Eachus, of Coseley, who has been a member of the Conference since its inception.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

TOLSTOY'S REPLY.

THE fine art of excommunication has gone. It began to perish when the ars artium—printing—was invented. Time was when heresy could be silenced with the death of him who gave it a voice. But print is the magic trumpet that not only carries a man's word far and wide, but that goes on sounding after the speaker himself has vanished. The crude coercion of the axe and stake tried hard to overcome this mysterious ally of all utterance, be it false or true. Men burned the book as well as the writer, with but indifferent success at the best. A few notable volumes appear to have been destroyed beyond recall. But even in such cases some waft of the thoughts has always got into the air. Or shall we say that, having gone up ELIJAH-like in a chariot of fire, they have come back in due time to be forerunners of the better age?

In the case of TOLSTOY whose "excommunication" was long expected and yet thought impossible—such pride we thought must be felt by all Russians in their greatest writer—the failure of the would-be ecclesiastic artists is complete. In his "Reply" (which may be had of the Free Age Press, Christchurch, Hants, price three-halfpence, post free), the brilliant realist gently taunts his priestly enemies with their inadequacy to the part they aspire to play. Indeed, if they meant to cut him off there was a prescribed way, as of course they knew well. But they chose a milder form, and no doubt it should be counted to them for righteousness; for though it is not in full accordance with discipline, the modifications appear to be due to kindly feeling and reluctance in proceeding to extremities. But, mild or ruthless in carrying out their policy, they have committed the oft-repeated mistake of making a martyr of the heretic.

They seem, according to his own statements, greatly to have over-rated the extent of his influence with his countrymen. He says: "I am well aware that there are in Russia hardly a hundred individuals who share my views." The circulation of his writings about religion is, he declares, insignificant in his own country. The censor does his work but too well. But coercionists are ever cowardly. In Russia, as elsewhere, the powers that make against liberty are the real slaves. One bold utterance in the name of freedom is echoed in their imagination till they tremble as if surrounded by a host of foes. Then they lose their shrewdness, and give the man they wish to silence the best of opportunities of being heard. How it may be in Russia, we do not know; but we in England have long understood the value to a cause of a little persecution. Some have been known to sigh for a new martyr-age for Unitarians. "If we could only have one burnt, now!" some ardent people have said, without naming which one.

But certainly TOLSTOY'S heresies will have a capital chance of being read in this country, thanks to the excommunicators; and presumably Western Europe generally as well as America and the Colonies will share the same advantages in this respect. So wide-sounding is this magician's trumpet; its notes circle the globe. Let them sound on. If there be falseness in them, the modern orbis terrarum, no longer the private enclosure of any sect or party, will rightly judge and condemn them. But if there be truth, some other systems of theology beside that of "the Holy Oriental Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Church" must reckon with it.

We commend this remarkable utterance to our readers. They will, if wise, seek to read it dispassionately, neither yielding too much to such prepossessions as sympathy with an injured old man may create, nor on the other hand allowing themselves to be provoked by passages that may challenge convictions long held dear. But while considering the words as candidly as possible, it will not be improper to remember that, fallible as TOLSTOY is, and chargeable with extreme or narrow views, in some respects or many, he is really the greatest living writer in his way. He is a man whose life is known and whose temperament and conduct suggest rather the case of the world's saintliest ones than any lesser men. He stands, too, at the edge where time melts into eternity. Such a man's words should be worth hearing.

And this, amongst other things, TOLSTOY says, not only to his excommunicators, but to all his brethren in and out of the Churches :—

It is further said that I "repudiate God worshipped in the Holy Trinity as Creator and Guardian of the universe, that I renounce the Lord Jesus Christ, Godman, Redeemer and Saviour of the world, Who has suffered for the sake of us men and our salvation, and risen from the dead, that I repudiate the immaculate conception of Christ the Lord and the virginity of Mary before and after His birth." That I repudiate the incomprehensible Trinity and the fable about the fall of the first man, which has no meaning at the present time, the sacrilegious story about a God born of a Virgin, and redeeming the human race—this is quite true. But God—a Spirit, God—Love, the only God, Source of all—I not only do not repudiate, I recognise nothing else as really existing except God; and the whole meaning of life I see only in the fulfilment of the Will of God as expressed in the Christian teaching.

It is again said: "He does not recognise future life and retribution." If one understands future life in the sense of the Second Advent, of hell with its eternal torments and devils, and of Paradise with its eternal bliss, then it is perfectly correct that I do not recognise such a future life. But eternal life and retribution here and everywhere, now and always, I recognise to such an extent that, standing as I am at my age on the border of the grave, I often have to exert an effort not to desire bodily death—i.e., birth to a new life. And I believe that every righteous act increases the true welfare of my eternal life, and that every evil act diminishes that welfare.

I believe in this: I believe in God, whom I comprehend as Spirit, as Love, as the Source of all. I believe that He is in me and I in Him. I believe that the Will of God is the most clearly and comprehensively expressed in the teaching of the man Christ, to regard whom as God, and to pray to whom, I deem the greatest blasphemy. I believe that the true welfare of man is in the fulfilment of the Will of God; and that His will consists in that men should love each other, and should, therefore, behave towards others as they desire that others should behave with them; as it is said in the Gospels, "in this is contained all the law and the prophets." I believe that the meaning of the life of every man, therefore, lies only in the increase of love in oneself; that this increase of love leads the individual man in this life towards greater and greater welfare; that after death it gives the greater welfare the more love there be in man; and that, at the same time, more than anything else, it contributes to the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth—i.e., to an order of life where the discord, deceit, and violence which now reign will be replaced by free agreement, truth, and brotherly love between men. I believe that for the development of Love there is but one means—prayer, not public prayer in churches, which was expressly forbidden by Christ (Matt. vi. 5-13); but the prayer, an example of which is given by Christ, solitary prayer, consisting in the re-establishment and strengthening in one's consciousness of the meaning of one's life and of one's dependence solely upon the Will of God.

Brave and truly venerable man! Whatever judgment is passed on points of theory all lovers of righteousness and freedom will rejoice in him.

WORDSWORTH'S IDEALS AND THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

BY THE REV. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.*

No doubt many of my hearers have asked themselves what Wordsworth has to do with the occasion that has drawn us together. My own answer to the question rests on a deep conviction that his was the strongest and most characteristic English voice heard in the nineteenth century; that it is in his words that the conscious or unconscious ideals of England are most clearly formulated; that it is by the measure of her conformity to his demands that the success or failure, the fidelity or apostasy, of England is best to be measured. His most characteristic utterances date from the very end of the eighteenth century, or the early decades —some would say the first decade—of the nineteenth century, and it is hardly too much to say that it was only at the end of that century that England fully realised Wordsworth and discovered the all-penetrating and transforming influence which he had exercised upon her spiritual life during the whole of its course. In our spiritual attitude towards nature, our fundamental conception of human relations and our resultant social and religious ideals we are nearer to Wordsworth than his contemporaries were. And as to our conception of the significance, the privileges and the obligations of nationality, many of us feel that our hope lies in a return in the beginning of the twentieth century to the note struck by Wordsworth early in the nineteenth.

Nature, Society, Nationality, then, are the three great conceptions as to which I would endeavour to give some account of Wordsworth's teaching with reference to the century through which we have just passed.

Any review of the nineteenth century seems naturally to start from the French Revolution, and the critical importance of the French Revolution in Wordsworth's own development has been very generally recognised, though perhaps the full scope and nature of that influence has not always been realised. Wordsworth's life in Cumberland, at Cambridge, and in London had given him abundance and variety of vital experiences, but had not brought him to reflect on life as a whole, either in its personal or its social aspects; and though he had always taken a vivid interest in man, whether in the spaciousness and dignity of the open-air life of the dalesman—

> A freeman, wedded to his life of hope
> And hazard, and hard labour interchanged
> With that majestic indolence so dear
> To native man—or in the "gay confusion" and the naïve self-importance and trifling of undergraduate life at the University, or in the huge mysterious massiveness of the crowded streams of humanity in London with its sense of "Power growing under weight," yet still his experience of man had impressed him less than his experience of nature.

The terrific upheaval of the French Revolution, which presented him with its ready-made solutions of the problems of human existence, first raised those problems themselves into conscious prominence in his mind.

This explains why the ardour of the Revolution was so slow to take hold of him. No sense of social need had prepared him for it. But it explains also the profound and abiding nature of the influence which the French Revolution came ultimately to exercise upon him; for it had waked in him the social sense, and he owed to it not only a more or less illusory set of solutions, but his very knowledge and sense of the social problem itself. How to make "the joy of one the joy of tens of millions" was this problem, the contemporaneous formulating and solution of which he seemed to witness as he saw

> France standing on the top of golden hours,
> And human nature seeming born again,

when

> A homeless sound of joy was in the sky.
> From hour to hour the antiquated earth
> Beat like the heart of man.

From this hour of glorious illusion—

> Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
> But to be young was very Heaven—

there was a long and terrible awakening. Wordsworth had been lifted high above the earth into a land of imaginary supramundane glories for which, nevertheless, he seemed at the moment to have the tangible guarantee of actual earthly fact. From these heights he was dashed down. Bruised and groaning from the fall, he had to make what terms he could with the unvarnished reality of

> The very world, which is the world
> Of all of us—the place where, in the end,
> We find our happiness, or not at all.

The demands and the problems brought to self-conscious formulation by the delirium of the French Revolution remained, but the solutions had all been swept away.

The history of the catastrophe may be read in brief dramatic consecutiveness. Europe, including England, banded against the cause of humanity as represented by the French Revolutionists, roused Wordsworth's patriotic love of his country from its slumber of unconsciousness, and it woke with a cry of sharpest anguish. Not till then did he know how every fibre of his being was rooted in his native soil. And now the sense that his country was fighting against right and truth jarred and embittered his whole being:—

> A conflict of sensations without name
> Of which he only, who may love the sight
> Of a village steeple, as I do, can judge,
> When, in the congregation bending all
> To their great Father, prayers were offered up,
> Or praises for our country's victories;
> And, 'mid the simple worshippers, perchance
> I only, like an uninvited guest
> Whom no one owned, sat silent, shall I add,
> Fed on the day of vengeance yet to come.
> Oh! much have they to account for, who would tear,
> By violence, at one decisive rent,
> From the best youth in England their dear pride,
> Their joy, in England.

The sense of nationality, as one of the primary possessions of humanity, thus born in agony, took its permanent place in Wordsworth's conception of life. It was his firm conviction that if France had been allowed to work out her own fate, the nobler spirits amongst the revolutionists would have guided the affairs of the nation; but that the opposition of the European dynasties flung the power into the most reckless and unscrupulous hands. All the crimes of the blood-stained revolutionary leaders he laid to the account of Europe, and not least of England; whilst the outward perversion of the principles of the revolution, thus brought about, only flung him on a more passionate advocacy of their inherent power and beauty. When Robespierre fell and authority put on a milder aspect, but the golden age still seemed as far off as ever, the poet hardened in his intellectual defence of abstract principles which were all now left to him, and his whole emotional nature dried up. But to adore reason must ultimately lead to scepticism; and so it was with Wordsworth. He dragged all his moral convictions, all his emotional experiences, like criminals to the bar of reason, and finding how ill they could justify themselves there, he flung up moral questions as hopeless, and threw himself into the study of physical science, not out of love for it, but out of despair concerning all else. This was "the crisis of the strong disease"; but when we ask for an equally dramatic exposition of Wordsworth's return to moral and emotional sanity, or of the principles on which he reconstructed his conception of life and his hopes for humanity, we are naturally baffled. For the process by which a man loses his faith, or his convictions, is usually one of intellectual analysis which can be definitely communicated, and which we can follow with intelligent realisation even if it does not convince us. But the recovery of positive and vital relations with the world of nature, of man, and of God, is to a large extent a matter of incommunicable experience; and in the case now before us it must be gathered from the sympathetic study of the poet's whole life-work, and it cannot be recorded in a few pages of his autobiography. And, indeed, the discovery of this very fact, that reason must have experience to work upon if it is to construct anything, marks the first step in what we may call Wordsworth's recovery. He had been led to idolise reason more and more as the one and only source of conviction. Now he realised, largely under the influence of his sister Dorothy, that reason cannot create. It can only work on the material given by experience; and so the question that lies at the basis of all philosophies of life is, "How does life impress us? how do we see and feel it?" The man who wishes permanently to affect men's conceptions of life must enable them to see and feel life otherwise than they have hitherto done. The first question, then, that Wordsworth, beginning life again, must ask himself was the question how this world in which we live had as a matter of fact uttered itself to him. And the first question for us is: What is the relation between the actual impression, sensuous and spiritual, that the external universe made upon Wordsworth, and the sense for nature characteristic of the beginning and of the end of the nineteenth century? Fortunately, it is unnecessary to enter into detail on this subject. It is generally felt and recognised that Wordsworth, more than any other poet, felt nature in least and in greatest, in detail and collectively, as a Divine Presence.

> Far and wide the clouds were touched,
> And in their silent faces could be read
> Unutterable love. Sound needed none,
> Nor any voice of joy; his spirit drank

* An Address given to the International Council of Unitarian and other Religious Thinkers and Workers at Essex Hall, on Friday morning, May 31.

The spectacle: sensation, soul, and form,
All melted into him; they swallowed up
His animal being; in them did he live,
And by them did he live; they were his life.
In such access of mind, in such high hour
Of visitation from the living God,
Thought was not; in enjoyment it expired.
No thanks he breathed, he proffered no request;
Rapt into still communion that transcends
The imperfect offices of prayer and praise,
His mind was a thanksgiving to the power
That made him; it was blessedness and love!—(Excursion.)

And, again,

For I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth, but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh, nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts: a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thoughts,
And rolls through all things.*
(Tintern Abbey.)

We are told by students of Wordsworth literature that though the Lyrical Ballads were received with varying praise and blame by the reviewers of the day and were not wholly unappreciated, not one single reviewer called attention to Tintern Abbey; but perhaps there are no lines in English literature which answer more perfectly to the religious consciousness of the end of the nineteenth century in the presence of nature than these. Wordsworth has given us a new sense, or, if he did not give it to us, he divined our possession of it and woke it into consciousness.

His theology, which was orthodox enough, may have been a prejudice, an unconscious conventional conformity, or a mature and reasoned conviction; but his direct religious sense of nature was something antecedent to reason. To communicate it to others is to awaken a potentiality into actuality, not to develop intellectual axioms into a system of thought and belief.

There was, indeed, a philosophical conviction that determined much of the tone of Wordsworth's utterances as to nature; but, after all, it affected his reflection upon his experiences rather than the vividness and intensity of the experiences themselves. The direct expression of this philosophical conception, when Wordsworth attempts it, is generally prosaic in the extreme; but its indirect flashes produce some of his sublimest poetry.

* The special tone of Wordsworth's nature-worship cannot be better illustrated than by a contrast between these well-known lines and a passage from a classical poet that corresponds to it almost word for word. Lucan's Cato, when declining to consult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, pours contempt on the idea that God has concealed Himself behind the sands of the desert to whisper to a few pilgrims the open revelation of the universe:—

"The seat of God is there where earth and sea and air and sky and virtue are. Why do we seek the gods beyond. Whatsoever you see, wheresoever you go, is Jupiter."—Pharsalia, Bk. ix.

Note here with identity of phrase the absolute contrast of spirit. To Lucan the order of the universe is the impressive and all-present manifestation of God. To Wordsworth the beauty and the passion of nature live and breathe, and nature is not the universal seat of deity, but is herself the Divine Presence.

Essentially it amounts to no more than this: that the fundamental problem of philosophy, the relation of the mind of man to the world outside itself, is insoluble. Sometimes one and sometimes the other side of this relationship asserts itself exclusively. Now we are to find salvation in "a wise passiveness," are to understand that

Our meddling intellect
Misshapes the beauteous forms of things, and are to aim only at seeing things as they are. And now we are to understand that "imagination" is a truly creative faculty, and that the reality is nothing but what we make it. It is not in the success of his attempts to reconcile these two ideas, but in the insight with which he embodies them severally that his greatness is shown. No man had a keener and healthier sense of externality than Wordsworth had, neither did any man more frequently or deeply realise that our only access to anything either material or spiritual outside ourselves is through our own internal faculties. And therefore every external revelation however august, every formulation of religious ideas however needful, is but an obscuration and a limitation of the primal facts of experience.

For I must tread on shadowy ground, must sink
Deep—and, aloft ascending, breathe in worlds
To which the heaven of heavens is but a veil,
All strength—all terror, single or in bands,
That ever was put forth in personal form—
Jehovah—with his thunder, and the choir
Of shouting Angels, and the empyreal thrones—
I pass them unalarmed. Not chaos, not
The darkest pit of lowest Erebus,
Nor aught of blinder vacancy, scooped out
By help of dreams—can breed such fear and awe
As fall upon us often when we look
Into our Minds, into the Mind of Man—
My haunt and the main region of my song.

When Wordsworth wrote these lines his least orthodox friends were scandalised by them, and he himself hardly knew what to make of them. At the end of the nineteenth century I read them to a friend from the Continent whose comment was to the effect: "I suppose they were written long ago; it does not need saying now."

The recognition that reason can only work upon experience, and that ultimate experience is to us ultimate fact, together with his own keen personal experience of the emotional significance of facts, qualifies what sometimes appears like Wordsworth's hostility to science. He who was

Contented to enjoy
What others understand, who denounces those who "murder to dissect," cannot indeed be held up as in any sense representing the scientific spirit of inquiry that has so profoundly characterised the latter half of the nineteenth century. But nevertheless Wordsworth would have been one of the comparatively few men who could thoroughly understand the late Professor Clifford's "cosmic emotion" in its application to mathematical formulae and conceptions. Auguste Comte and William Wordsworth join hands with each other and with Clifford in their deep sense of the emotional significance of mathematical conceptions—

A pleasure quiet and profound, a sense
Of permanent and universal sway,
And paramount belief;

though I suppose of all the three Wordsworth alone could have added,

There recognised
A type, for finite natures, of the one
Supreme existence, the surpassing life
Which—to the boundaries of space and time,
Of melancholy space and doleful time,
Inferior and incapable of change,
Nor touched by witherings of passion—is,
And hath the name of God.

Verily the religion of science, the devout rapture of communion with and rest upon abstract Truth, was not wanting to this man.

And this leads us by an easy transition to Wordsworth's realism. He believed with unshaken faith that to see things truly is to see them beautifully, and that he who sees things truly and beautifully will be spontaneously and securely virtuous.* Hence duty and mathematics stand in close relation to each other†—a relation that has puzzled some of Wordsworth's ablest critics—for they stand for right action and right thinking, and truth and virtue are inseparable.

Of this faith
Never forsaken, that by acting well,
And understanding, I should learn to love
The end of life, and everything we know.

But we must not rest in the idea of duty as an external power or as the ultimate and highest motive. As long as self-sacrifice is self-sacrifice and not self-realisation, it is but a makeshift.

Denial and restraint I prize
No further than they breed a second Will more wise.

Spontaneity and divine enjoyment are the goal. And it is only needful for us to see ourselves as we are, and to feel our true relations to the world and to each other, in order to realise more than revolutionary, nay, more than Utopian ideals.

Beauty—a living presence of the earth,
Surpassing the most fair ideal forms
Which crafts of delicate spirits hath composed
From earth's materials—waits upon my steps;
Pitches her tents before me as I move,
An hourly neighbour. Paradise, and groves
Elysian, fortunate fields—like those of old Sought in the Atlantic Main—why should they be
A history only of departed things,
Or a mere fiction of what never was?
For the discerning intellect of man,
When wedded to this goodly universe
In love and holy passion, shall find these
A simple produce of the common day.
—I, long before the blissful hour arrives,
Would chant, in lonely peace, the spousal verse
Of this great consummation—and, by words
Which speak of nothing more than what we are,
Would I rouse the sensual from their sleep
Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain
To noble raptures.

But what of the rank and file of humanity? Is this vision of glory for them too? Have the lives lived in the rustic hovel or in the city slum only to be

* To console the afflicted; to add sunshine to daylight by making the happy happier; to teach the young, and the gracious of every age, to see, to think, to feel, and therefore to become more actively and securely virtuous.—Wordsworth to Lady Beaumont.

† But, by the storms of circumstance unshaken,
And subject neither to eclipse nor wane,
Duty exists;—immutably survive,
For our support, the measures and the forms,
Which an abstract intelligence supplies,
Where Kingdom is, where time and space are not.

seen as they are in order to be beautiful? Passages too long to quote, in the Eighth and Ninth Books of the Excursion, show how deeply Wordsworth was sensible of the sordid and dehumanizing conditions under which a great part of humanity now lives. And as for sorrow he was under no illusions—

Such grateful haunts foregoing, if I oft
Must turn elsewhere—to travel near the tribes
And fellowships of men, and see ill sights
Of madding passions mutually inflamed;
Must hear humanity in fields and groves
Pipe solitary anguish; or must hang Brooding above the fierce confederate storm
Of sorrow, barricadoed evermore
Within the walls of cities—may these sounds
Have their authentic comment, that even these Hearing I be not downcast or forlorn.

What, then, is Wordsworth's "authentic comment"? Why are we not to be "downcast or forlorn"? This brings us back once more to our starting-point in the French Revolution. All revolutionary movements are directed against the institutions of society, and all of them are apt to confuse the effect of those institutions with the effect of more permanent and less modifiable conditions of human life, or factors of human nature. The collapse of his hopes based on the French Revolution brought Wordsworth to the conviction that no institutional changes could have supreme transforming power upon the state of man on earth; therefore the question of questions must be, What are the possibilities of those permanent inevitable relations which exist between man and man and between man and nature? There is much in the lot of man which may be and ought to be changed, but at the end of the chapter man must support his life by intercourse with nature, animate and inanimate, and must stand in the elementary relations of husband and wife, parent and child, brother, lover, friend, fellow-countryman, to his kind. All else is superstructure and may be varied. This is essential and permanent. The possibilities of mankind as a whole are conditioned by the possibilities of these relations. Hence the profound significance, not sufficiently understood even yet, of Wordsworth's studies of peasant life.

"Inspect the basis of the social pile:
Inquire," said I, "how much of mental power
And genuine virtue they possess who live
By bodily toil, labour exceeding far
Their due proportion, under all the weight
Of that injustice which upon ourselves
Ourselves entail."

Hence the fascination of the life of the people for him, hence his attempt to read the thoughts and experiences of the vast masses who do not talk.

Shy, and unpractised in the strife of phrase;
Meek men, whose very souls perhaps would sink
Beneath them, summoned to such intercourse:
Theirs is the language of the heavens, the power,
The thought, the image, and the silent joy:
Words are but under-agents in their souls;
When they are grasping with their greatest strength,
They do not breathe among them.

Hence his desire to look into the eyes of the tramp or wayfarer, where he saw into the depths of human souls—

Souls that appear to have no depth at all
To careless eyes.

And here again his ultimate test is not philosophy or reflection, but experience. And his ultimate answer is not, as has often been perversely represented, that every peasant is a poet and a philosopher; but that the essential elements of a worthy life are not precluded by the essential conditions of living upon the earth. Hence the belief that, although the social harmony has not yet been found, there is no pre-ordained and essential discord between the universal conditions of life and its highest ideal possibilities.

I have said that it is a perverse misrepresentation to say that Wordsworth regards every peasant as a poet and a philosopher. Yet it is an essential part of his conception of things to regard the experiences of the ordinary man as containing in them, so to speak, poetic and philosophic stuff in an undeveloped and unconscious state. The rapture of communion with nature expressed in the Excursion, the Prelude, Tintern Abbey, and a hundred other poems, is the highest form of the elemental emotions experienced by the peasant in his dealings with nature. These dealings, it is true, rest on a material, not an emotional basis; but the intercourse once established has in itself a refining emotional value which unites the peasant to the poet*:—

And this whole vale
Home of untutored shepherds as it is,
Swarms with sensation, as with gleams of sunshine,
Shadows or breezes, scents or sounds. Nor deem
These feelings, though subservient more than ours
To every day's demand for daily bread,
And borrowing more their spirit and their shape
From self-respecting interests; deem them not Unworthy therefore, and unhallowed—no,
They lift the animal being, do themselves
By nature's kind and ever-present aid
Refine the selfishness from which they spring,
Redeem by love the individual sense
Of anxiousness, with which they are combined,
And thus it is that fitly they become Associates in the joy of purest minds:
They blend therewith congenially:

Indeed even when love of the soil and of the things that live on it approximates to the hard or avaricious type, as may be said of the emotions displayed in Michael and in the Last of the Flock, yet to Wordsworth they are never wholly without dignity and even elevation so long as they are based on primary instincts and cement primary relations.

Thus Wordsworth occupies a position of his own with regard to the relations of the privileged few and the unprivileged many. Some have avowed the doctrine (and more have lived by it) that the many exist only for the sake of the few; that the life of the multitude is not itself worth having, but that it may make it worth the while of the few to live. Others have found the only happiness in the absence of thought, and have idealised the life of the rustic or the mechanic.* According to this idea, to think is to be disillusionised, consciousness is misery. Wordsworth's position is that leisure and immunity from the common lot of toil, though it would be a curse to many, is to be valued by chosen spirits, not because it enables them to escape, but because it enables them to intensify, the common human experiences. And hence the significance in Wordsworth's scheme of things, of such a life as he himself lived, especially in the earlier and more fruitful days of his poetic activity. Its significance lay in the choice he himself made amongst the alternatives of life. He had no ascetic love of poverty, but being a a free agent he deliberately chose the things he thought most worth having, and sacrificed the rest. Simplicity of life he doubtless valued for its own sake, because, like St. Francis, though with more sobriety, he felt that the multitude of things that a man possesses may drain away his vital forces and crush his life out of him. He sought for naked contact with the realities of life. So far as material possessions are a necessity of life or an instrument of life, they are to be desired; but when they constitute a claim upon our vital energies and shield us from vital experiences, they are an encumbrance and a curse. When all the world seems to be blindly and desperately striving for the means of life, it is difficult to exaggerate the social significance of the man who, even if he make no direct contribution to the solution of social problems and take no part in specifically philanthropic effort, shows by his life that he knows the things most worth living for, and lives for them.

It is hardly necessary to point out how profoundly interpretative of the efforts often groping and unconscious of the best thought and feeling of our age these theories and practices of Wordsworth are. If Wordsworth's spirit penetrated society, I will not say that all social problems would be solved, but the blindness and the passion that are hostile to their solution, would be annihilated.

It remains to deal with the place of Nationality in Wordsworth's scheme. I have already spoken of the birth, with a cry of pain, of his sense of the significance of nationality as one of the general conditions affecting the life of man. The whole drama of European history at the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the

*No doubt if you in terms direct had asked Whether he loved the mountains, true it is
That with blunt repetition of your words
He might have stared at you, and said that they Were frightful to behold; but had you then Discoursed with him . . . . .
Of his own business, and the goings on
Of earth and sky, then truly had you seen
That in his thoughts there were obscurities,
Wonder and admiration, things that wrought
Not less than a religion in his heart.

*Wordsworth himself has put their creed into the mouth of one of his characters in the Excursion.

"Praise to the sturdy plough,
And patient spade; praise to the simple crook,
And ponderous loom—resounding while it holds
Body and mind in one captivity;
And let the light of mechanic tool be hailed
With honour; which, encasing by the power
Of long companionship, the artist's hand,
Cuts off that hand, with all its world of nerves,
From a too busy commerce with the heart!
—Inglorious implements of craft and toil,
Both ye that shape and build, and ye that force,
By slow solicitation, earth to yield
Her annual bounty, sparingly dealt forth
With wise reluctance; you would I extol,
Not for gross good alone which ye produce,
But for the impertinent and ceaseless strife
Of proofs and reasons ye preclude—in those Who to your dull society are born,
And with their humble birthright rest content.
—Would I had ne'er renounced it!"

nineteenth century served to impress this upon him; and though there were long periods of his life in which he professed the profoundest indifference to politics and declared that he never looked at a newspaper, yet anything that affected the national life or touched the sacred principle of nationality always woke the profoundest emotion in him, and sometimes made it impossible to him for months or almost years to think or write on other themes.* He had seen the nascent sense of French nationality beating back the dynastic forces of the whole of Europe; he had seen that national sense which at first he greeted with such enthusiasm, perverted into a devastating spirit of imperialism; he had seen the nationality of England stand out as a bulwark of freedom; he had seen the despised nationality of Spain breaking the sweep of French imperialism before which all the dynasties had gone down:—

The power of Armies is a visible thing,
Formal, and circumscribed in time and space;
But who the limits of that power shall trace
Which a brave People into light can bring
Or hide, at will,—for freedom combating
By just revenge inflamed? No foot may chase,
No eye can follow, to a fatal place
That power, that spirit, whether on the wing
Like the strong wind, or sleeping like the wind
Within its awful caves.—From year to year
Springs this indigenous produce far and near;
No craft this subtle element can bind,
Rising like water from the soil, to find
In every nook a lip that may cheer.

He had marked the critical significance of the rise of the sense of German nationality; he had wept over the apparent fall of the Swiss patriots, and had exulted in the magnificent heroism of the Tyrolese, and refused to believe in its futility:—

Sleep, Warriors, sleep! among your hills repose!
We know that (ye, beneath the stern control
Of awful prudence, keep (the unvanquished soul:
And when, impatient of her guilt and woes,
Europe breaks forth; then, Shepherds! shall ye rise
For perfect triumph o'er your enemies.

The principle of nationality was to him amongst the most sacred things in life, and he who raised his hand against it was guilty of the unpardonable sin.† When England appeared to him as the oppressor of French nationality, she was to him the enemy of human kind, and his pride and joy in his country only returned when she became in his eyes the champion of oppressed nationalities. Her greatness, like the greatness of the individual, consisted in the simplicity and the directness of her ideals; her danger, like the danger of the individual, lay in idolatry of wealth and glitter, and in the confusion of bigness with greatness.

Rapine, avarice, expense,
This is idolatry; and these we adore:
Plain living and high thinking is no more.

Shall I, as heretofore, compare the ideal of Wordsworth with European aspirations and controlling motives at the close of the nineteenth century? Shall I ask, what are the national ideals at this moment of England, Germany, Russia, Austria, America, the national aspirations of Italy and Greece, the national traditions of Spain? Shall I ask, what principles have guided the Great Powers in their dealings with Finland, Turkey, China, Crete, Cuba, the Philippines, the Transvaal, and the Orange State, now no longer "Free"? The mere enumeration of these questions is enough to show that no single and simple answer could be given to them; but taken collectively, they must surely startle and appal us. This may not be the time or place in which to discuss the part our own country is playing in this drama, or the relation in which her action stands to Wordsworth's patriotic ideals; though to my thinking, at the present juncture, there is no time or place in which a patriotic Englishman should conceal his opinions on these questions. But whatever our opinions and whatever our passions, surely not one of us can afford in this great crisis of our spiritual life to neglect the warnings and the exhortations contained in Wordsworth's poems "Dedicated to the spirit of national independence and liberty." I can hardly conceive of an Englishman who will not feel that the principles there set forth, and the passions there expressed, are true and noble, that they express the highest aspirations of his country and those that he would fain hope are deepest and most permanent. He who brings his patriotic love and hate, his patriotic confidence and apprehensions, the thought of the things for which as a patriot he lives, and for which as a patriot he is ready to die, to be tested in the furnace which glows in these poems, shall surely find it purified of its dross and wrought to a higher temper.

* Much has been said of Wordsworth's apostasy from the revolutionary creed of his youth; but my own belief is that the more Wordsworth is studied, the more shall we believe that if there is a certain drying and hardening of this side as of other sides of his nature, there is no breach of continuity, no fundamental inconsistency, and certainly no approach to a dishonourable apostasy in the progress of his opinions.

† Not by bread alone is the life of man sustained; not by raiment alone is he warmed;—but by the genial and vernal inmate of the breast, which at once pushes forth and cherishes; by self-support and self-sufficing endeavours; by anticipations, apprehensions, and active remembrances; by elasticity under insult, and firm resistance to injury; by joy, and by love; by pride which his imagination gathers in from afar; by patience, because life wants not promises; by admiration; by gratitude which—debasing him not when his fellow-being is its object—habitually expands itself, for his elevation in complacency towards his Creator.

Now, to the existence of these blessings, national independence is indispensable; and many of them it will itself produce and maintain.—The Convention of Cintra.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The Annual Public Examination of the Students was held on Wednesday, July 3, in the Memorial Hall, Manchester. The visitors were the Rev. Philemon Moore, B.A., and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. During the day four of the students preached sermons, which indicated considerable pulpit ability.

In the afternoon the usual visitor's address was delivered by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, who described the impressions made upon him by the students' work. He said that on the whole they might be fairly congratulated upon the results of their year's study. He recommended them strongly to take up one subject for special mastery; in addition to knowing something of everything, they ought to know "everything of something." Their judgments would be superficial and of little value unless they carried with them through life the habit of definite, continuous searching study in one department of research. The best gift which a college could bestow was not a particular mass of facts or a particular collection of views, but a method. Mr. Carpenter went on to speak of the progress made in theological study during recent years, and quoted from articles in theological dictionaries of different dates to show the growth of enlightenment on many points of dogmatical teaching. The article on Jesus Christ in each differed to a remarkable extent; dogmas which theologians at one time enforced had been allowed to drop, and in the "Encyclopædia Biblica," published this year, the view of Christ taken by Dr. Bruce, was a frankly humanitarian one. Instead of a theological Christ, the Christ presented by Dr. Bruce was the teacher, the healer, the helper of men. Throughout the article there was a recognition in Christ of all the elements which belonged to his age, and free admissions that legendary elements of a supernatural kind had found their way into the story of his life. Jesus Christ was treated by Dr. Bruce as the author of a great moral impulse, as a communicator of life to men, their quickener and inspirer, but in no sense as their God. The Unitarians believed themselves able, more than all others, to interpret the person and work of Jesus to this age. They sought to disengage his real teaching from the various elements of difficulty which so often (confuse and disturb the impression which his life and teaching make upon the soul; to liberate that and to carry it forth into the world as his message for the abolition of the world's sins and the building up of its life into perfection. Speaking of the College as a missionary institution, Mr. Carpenter urged the students to seek for examples of heroic missionary zeal in all fields of activity. The missionary spirit existed wherever great aims were pursued or high ideals were carried into strange and unfamiliar places and upheld in spite of apathy and discouragement. Mazzini, Cobden, Lord Shaftesbury—these were typical instances of the missionary spirit, although they were outside the field of technical religion. The mark of the missionary in all ages had been a passionate love of human souls, and an ardent desire to make the kingdom of God a living reality on earth.

The Principal (the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A.) prefaced the prize-giving with a few remarks, in the course of which he said that a college is not made by its tutors, or its committee, or its visitors, but by its students. They give it its tone and its character, and they might be proud and happy to think that their College to-day had its earnestness and robustness and faithfulness deeply implanted in the hearts and minds of a fine body of young men who have turned to their studies with an amount of success, and who have implanted in them a strong ambition to be true revealers of God's will and truth to their followers.

At Victoria University Mr. Schroeder had graduated M.A., Messrs. Dawtrey, Evans, Jones, and McLachlan, B.A., and Mr. Thackray had passed his Intermediate. Several important prizes had been won by the students at Owens College. At the Unitarian Home Missionary College the Sharpe Prize for Biblical knowledge had been won by Mr. Eustace Thompson, who had also taken the Bibby Prize for Greek. Mr. W. L. Schroeder was awarded a prize for general excellence, and Mr. H. Kelsey White also received a prize. Mr. Schroeder and Mr. White, who are beginning ministerial work, were presented with certificates from the College.

In the evening a service was held in the Cross-street Chapel to bid farewell to the two departing students. It was conducted by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS, and there was an unusually large congregation. The address was based upon Hebrews viii. 5, and is substantially given in another part of this paper.

On the following Friday evening there was held the usual students' soirée at the Memorial Hall. Many friends were present. Mr. Eustace Thompson was chairman, and a capital programme of music and speeches was provided. The two retiring students have accepted ministerial appointments — Mr. Schroeder is now minister at Sale, and Mr. Kelsey White minister at Urmston.

THE EASTERN UNION.

THE annual meetings of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches were held at Ipswich on July 1.

The proceedings began at twelve o'clock, when a religious service was held in the fine old chapel, the Rev. W. L. Tavener conducting the devotional part, and the Rev. R. H. Fuller, of Braintree, preaching a powerful and outspoken sermon on bearing one's own and other people's burdens.

After luncheon, served in the schoolroom, the annual business meeting was held, presided over by Mr. R. W. LADELL, of Norwich. The secretary, the Rev. A. HALL, read the report, which showed steady progress in the work of most of the twelve churches forming the Union. Amongst other items of interest the report stated:—

The Rev. John Dale resigned the pulpit at Bury St. Edmunds at the beginning of 1901 to take up work at Selby, and the services have since been carried on by the members of the chapel, assisted by occasional supplies.

The pulpit at Lynn has been vacant during the whole of the year, but we learn there is good hope that a minister will soon be settled there.

We are glad to report that the congregation at Ipswich has secured a capable and hard-working pastor in the Rev. Lucking Tavener, who took up his duties in January, and that there are already signs of more vigorous and healthy life.

It will be remembered that the Revs. C. D. Badland and A. Hall settled in the district during 1900, and it is hoped that through these recent settlements it will be long before we have again to report changes in the district, and that steady instead of broken work may be done by the Union.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties has taken over the cause at Halstead, as being more workable by them than by us. . . . The present vacancies in the district are due to the inability of our small but enthusiastic congregations to raise among their members salaries sufficient to justify the settlement of capable ministers.

At Norwich the congregation is progressing, the school has increased, and a special service welcoming twenty-five young people into the church was held in May. The renovations to the chapel at Ipswich have been completed during year; reopening services were held last December in connection with the bicentenary of the chapel. The congregation is increasing under its new minister. A considerable stir has been caused in the town by the refusal to admit Mr. Tavener into the Brotherhood of the Social Settlement, an unsectarian society, on the plea that he is not a Christian. The question has been taken up by the local papers, and Mr. Tavener has utilised the occasion by giving a course of sermons in defence of Unitarianism. Large congregations have been the result, and several new members have joined the Church. The outlook is in every way hopeful for Ipswich.

Plans are about to be suggested for organising the work of lay-preachers in the district. References were made to the exchange of pulpits by ministers, and to several special courses of sermons and lectures at Norwich, Braintree, Ipswich, and Yarmouth.

The report of the Postal Mission had been sent by Miss Dowson. It showed a large increase on the previous year in the letters received and sent; 209 letters had been received, 90 from fresh applicants, and 72 correspondents remained on the books.

In moving the adoption of the report, Mr. TAVENER detailed how the Postal Mission had shown him his home after being considered for so long a heretic in orthodox bodies.

In seconding the adoption, Mr. AMEY said that he also was made a Unitarian by the means of the Postal Mission.

Another testimony to the value of the Postal Mission was given at the close of the meeting by an old man from the workhouse, a regular attendant at the Ipswich services, who spoke of the great interest it had been to receive literature on Unitarianism from Lady Wilson.

Miss E. M. LAWRENCE, representing the Central Postal Mission, spoke encouragingly of the work she saw the Postal Mission of the Eastern Union was doing.

The evening meeting was attended by about one hundred people. It was preceded by an organ recital, given by Miss Poole, on the new organ, which was presented by the late Miss Durning Smith to the chapel when it was re-opened after renovation.

The chair was taken by the President of the Union, Mr. R. W. LADELL, of Norwich. Addresses were given by Miss E. M. Lawrence, of London, who, in an encouraging and bright speech, brought greetings and good wishes of success to the Union in the new century from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Central Postal Mission; by the Rev. C. D. Badland, of Yarmouth, who spoke on "Our Position"; by Mr. Robinson (the President elect), by Mr. Blazeby (the Treasurer), the Revs. R. H. Fuller, A. Amey, and A. Hall.

The meeting was brought to a close by the singing of the hymn, "O star of truth down shining."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—The annual flower festival was held here on Sunday. In the morning the order of service for children, with musical responses, appended to hymns and choral songs, was followed. The preacher for the day was the Rev. Neander Anderton, B.A., of Preston, who gave the address in the morning, and delivered helpful and appropriate sermons in the afternoon and evening.

Ainsworth.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. Frank Walters (of Newcastle-on-Tyne). The chapel was very crowded, many being unable to get in. Special hymns and anthems were sung under the direction of Mr. W. Rigby, Mus. Bac. Collections amounted to £40 6s. 10d.

Chatham.—A party of over 230 persons connected with the Sunday-school had an excursion on Wednesday week to Herne Bay, under the guidance of Mr. C. Abbott, secretary, assisted by numerous friends, including the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock.

Crediton.—The Rev. E. H. Bollard has resigned the pulpit of the Bowden-hill Chapel.

Cullompton.—The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, B.A., of Taunton, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the congregation to become their resident minister. His ministry here dates from July 1.

Ditchling.—A correspondent writes:—"First Sunday in July. We remember of old hearing of a little girl who looked for this fixture in the almanack, and was much concerned that Old Moore had not thought it worthy of insertion. Year by year, as the day comes round, without even Calendar reminder, friends gather from far and near to offer good wishes to their co-religionists at this plucky little outpost, and of late years somewhat of a revival of success has marked the anniversaries. The Rev. W. J. Jupp, of Liverpool, was the preacher of the day, and his recent tour in Palestine furnished the thoughts that were embodied in the morning discourse, which concluded with an apt local illustration from Hudson's 'In Down Land.' Several of the visitors sought the 'calm of hills above' during the afternoon, and visitors from Lewes took advantage of the delightful weather to walk to Ditchling over them, in time for morning service."

Horsham.—The annual school excursion to the seaside took place on Monday, when a large party visited Littlehampton and partook of the usual seaside pleasures.

London: Stratford.—The annual excursion of the Sunday-school took place on Saturday, July 6, to Forest Lodge (Bartholomew's), High Beech; 150 children, teachers, and friends were conveyed in brakes. The teachers desire to thank those friends who generously contributed towards the expenses.

Manchester: Strangeways.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, June 23, when the church was decorated with many beautiful flowers and plants. The Rev. J. C. Street preached morning and evening, and the Rev. T. Robinson addressed the young people in the afternoon. Special hymns were sung by the scholars, and the normal congregations were increased by the presence of visitors, particularly in the evening.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual picnic was held at Gee Cross on Saturday last, and was attended by about 260 persons. After tea in the schools, a ramble was conducted over Werneth Low, towards and through Bottom's Hall Wood. Mr. W. Woolley acted as leader. At an informal meeting in the fields, a vote of thanks to the Gee Cross friends was moved by the Rev. T. R. Elliott (President), seconded by the Rev. N. Green, and responded to by the Rev. H. E. Dowson and Mr. Woolley. Others present included the Rev. H. T. Tayler, W. Harrison, and W. C. Hall, and Messrs. E. B. Broadrick (vice-president) and A. Slater (hon. sec.).

Saffron Walden.—On the 7th inst. the eighty-second anniversary of the Sunday-school was held. In the evening an American floral service was effectively rendered, entitled "A Greeting to the Flowers." The chapel was full; good collections were taken up. Miss Brinkworth presided at the organ.

Scarborough.—The Rev. Ottwell Binns, late Congregational minister of Portland, has been appointed minister here.

South Shields.—Our many friends will be pleased to learn of the progress that our church is making. The average attendance for Sunday evening service for the first six months of this year reveals an increase, over that of 1900, of twenty-one adults per service. The church finances have also correspondingly increased. A healthier interest in church life is being taken. A growing brightness particularises all our services and an awakening of spiritual fervour is manifest. The entrance to our schoolroom from a back street, and a lack of classroom accommodation, is our drawback. This difficulty can be surmounted. A bazaar to raise a small deficit in the ministerial fund, and meet the contemplated cost of addition to premises, is being pushed forward. On Tuesday evening a presentation of a mounted baton was made, through Mr. A. Adams, to Mr. A. Robinson, choir master. The minister, Mr. Paxton, presided.

Stockport.—The following events are reported, all being much enjoyed:—A garden party, June 12, at Brimmington House, by invitation of Mr. J. G. Johnson, sixty being present; a picnic, June 27, by the Ladies' Social Meeting, at Boggart Hole Clough, forty-two taking part; and on July 4 another garden party, attended by some 120 persons, at Woodbank, by invitation of Mr. Herbert Marsland.

Taunton.—On the occasion, on June 28, of the funeral of Mr. Meyer Jacobs, a prominent citizen of Taunton, being the first Mayor and twice re-elected to the same office, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington officiated, in the absence of the Jewish Rabbi; and while testifying to the deceased gentleman's public services, Mr. Worthington said they who held different religious views from him would all recognise his fidelity to the eternal pieties that underlie Judaism and Christianity alike.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The thirty-fourth annual meeting of the above Union was held on Saturday, June 29, at Holbeck, Leeds. There was a good attendance. The sermon was preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross, from the words—"And ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath; but nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord" (Ephesians vi. 4). It was truly a most able, inspiring, and practical discourse, showing the great importance of the personal influence of teachers on those committed to their charge in our Sunday-schools. At the public meeting which followed the tea, the retiring President (Mr. Fred. Clayton) took the chair, and was supported by a number of ministers, laymen, and ladies of the district. The report was remarkably encouraging in every respect, indicating that a good work was being done by all the schools in the Union. The financial statement was equally satisfactory. The officers for the ensuing year are as follows:—President, Mr. Councillor Conyers; vice-presidents, Messrs. Fred. Clayton and W. Holgate; hon. treasurer, Mrs. Wardrop Griffiths; hon. secretaries, Messrs. C. H. Boyle, B. Ferro, and J. Harrison; book steward, Mr. P. R. Jackson; lantern steward, Mr. E. Hill; and auditor, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot. The Rev. J. P. Spalding and Mr. F. Blackwell represented the Manchester Sunday School Association and the North Midland Association respectively.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

OBJECT.

To aid Ministers who are Members of the Conference to obtain Old Age Pensions.

METHOD.

Ministers shall be insured in the Equitable Life Insurance Society for yearly pensions of £52 (or double pensions of £104) on attaining the age of sixty-five years, with or without the sum of £250 at death. The income of the Fund shall be applied to pay half the necessary premiums, but if the premium exceed £20 the Fund shall not contribute more than £10. All Ministers who are Members of the Conference shall be eligible for benefit, subject to the right of the Managers to select those whom they shall deem most fitting, should the income of the Fund prove at any time insufficient to assist all candidates for insurance.

A capital sum of £20,000 and a yearly income of £300 in subscriptions are required to meet the needs of insurers at the outset, and provide for the gradual increase in their number during the first ten or fifteen years.

TREASURERS.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OF the "Pilgrimage" to Catterick last Saturday we have this week a full report. A note in our issue of last week, looking upon the pilgrims from afar, saw them "among the hills of Yorkshire"; but on nearer approach Catterick is found not to be among the hills. From its neighbourhood one can indeed see the Hambleton Hills in the distance to the east, beyond which lie Helmsley and Rievaulx Abbey, but the Swale, before it reaches Catterick Bridge, has already issued from its own dale, and has left its glorious moorland heights far behind. From Richmond onward it flows through the broad plain, until it reaches the Ure, and so past York to the sea.

CATTERICK, once a Roman station, is on one of the great north roads, amidst charming country. The church, which has been restored and enlarged by an added clerestory and a loftier roof since Lindsey's day, stands on an eminence in the midst of the village, and from the churchyard one passes through a door into the vicarage garden. The village streets with ample space, and on two sides spreading out to pleasant greens, encompass the central block of buildings round the church. On one side runs the village beck, which joins the Swale about a quarter of a mile away. There are delightful walks on every side, paths through the fields and by the stream, with meadow-sweet and willow-herb and other summer flowers for comrades, where one could find the perfect rest of country solitude, and recall the memory of those who more than a hundred years ago loved those scenes.

IN the garden of Catterick Vicarage last Saturday a photograph of the "Pilgrims" was taken, grouped about the present vicar of the parish. It will be a pleasant memorial of an interesting occasion. We understand that a very excellent picture has been secured, and that copies may be ordered through Mr. E. H. Coysh, of 110, Brighton-grove, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The cost is 3s. 6d. for an ordinary photograph, and 5s. for a platinotype, with 6d. extra for postage.

THE programme issued for the Catterick Pilgrimage contained an interesting record of the commemoration of 1849, and quotes from the Christian Reformer of that date a report of the speech made by the venerable William Turner, then in his eighty-eighth year, who remembered the visit of Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey and Miss Harrison (afterwards Mrs. Cappe) to his father's house in Wakefield, the day after their leaving Catterick, for the last time, on Wednesday, Dec. 8, 1773. Telling of this memorable visit, Mr. Turner is reported to have said that on the day after their arrival Dr. Priestley came over from Leeds, and "after a few pleasant and edifying days spent in Mr. Turner's house Mr. Lindsey proceeded to London." This is a statement which may furnish an exercise in the elements of historical criticism. For it will be remembered that Dr. Priestley at that time was no longer minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, but was librarian to Lord Shelburne, and it will be seen from the delightful Memoirs of Mrs. Catharine Cappe that six days after he is said to have come over from Leeds Dr. Priestley wrote to Mr. Turner at Wakefield from London, telling how all his friends "are very sanguine, in favour of Mr. Lindsey's Unitarian Chapel," and how both he and Lord Shelburne, to whom he had shown it, had been much affected by the reading of Lindsey's Farewell Address to his parishioners. Mrs. Cappe also quotes a letter of Turner's, showing that the Lindseys stayed only one whole day and part of another at Wakefield, proceeding on Saturday, Dec. 11, to Dr. Disney's at Swinderby, near Newark. It was only in January, 1774, that they reached London. These notes we offer as an exercise in criticism to any who may be sufficiently interested to look up further evidence to show whether Priestley was or was not in Wakefield on the day alleged.

AT the Whitsuntide meeting of the International Council Iceland was represented by Dr. Stefansson, who brought a message of warm sympathy and brotherly regard from the poet, Matthias Jochumsson. A recent letter from Mr. Jochumsson to the Secretary of the B. and F.U.A., expressing great interest in the visit of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong to Iceland, goes on to speak with great delight of the success of the May meetings of those whom he feels to be his "dearest and nearest Christian brethren." Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon, he says, seemed to have been written out of his own heart, and as some twenty ministers were about to hold a meeting at Akureyri (where Jochumsson lives, on the northern coast of Iceland) he had translated the sermon, and was about to read it to them, with comments of his own. For, though known as a decided Unitarian, the poet commands a hearing from his countrymen, and he is confident that there is a good prospect for liberal Christianity in Iceland.

THE Rev. T. R. Skemp, formerly of Ramsgate, landed in England on the 12th inst., after an absence of about eighteen months. During the twelve months prior to his return, he occupied the pulpit of the Unitarian Church in Sydney, and, on leaving, received many expressions of regret from those who had attended the church. We are glad to hear that Mr. Skemp's health has benefited considerably by a long sea-voyage and an extended sojourn in Australia. His present address is Park-gate-avenue, Withington, Manchester.

Yr Ymofynydd for July opens with an appreciation of the late Gwilym Marles (the Rev. W. Thomas, M.A., 1834-1879) as a schoolmaster, by the Rev. T. T. Phillips, B.D., congregational minister at Bala, who is an old pupil. There are articles in the New Century meetings by the editor and the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, of Swansea, in which some of the portraits, which appeared in the New Kingdom, are reproduced. "The Religion of Principal V. Jones, of Cardiff," and "Higher Criticism and the Sunday School," are among the other subjects dealt with.

SOMEONE has sent us a copy of the Birmingham Daily Gazette of July 15, with a "communicated" column, headed "A Priestley Reminiscence." The misrepresentations of that vulgar diatribe do not require serious notice.

INTERNATIONAL UNITARIAN LITERATURE.

SIR,—As a regular reader of THE INQUIRER, may I be permitted to offer a few remarks on the above subject, and especially in relation to the translation of Unitarian Literature into Arabic for circulation among Mohammedans.

I have often wondered why certain works, such as Channing's, for instance, and also suitable sermons by well-known Unitarian ministers and preachers, have not been circulated amongst Mohammedans, as it seems to me that here is a suitable field for the spreading of Unitarian Christian ideas.

The testimony of Père Hyacinthe, as quoted in THE INQUIRER, June 29, by Mr. Sunderland, is one that should have every thoughtful consideration. If we look at the great religions of the world, I think we shall agree that perhaps next to Judaism, Mohammedanism is more nearly allied to Christianity than any other, and, of course, more especially to Unitarian Christianity.

As a reader of the Koran, and also as one who has every sympathy with the Mohammedan religion, I thoroughly agree with the remarks of Mr. Sunderland, when he says: "That with Christianity in its Trinitarian forms Mohammedans will have nothing to do." This reminds me somewhat of a paragraph I read some few years ago in a paper which represents Evangelical thought in the Church of England; the paragraph ran thus: "Having seen only the Oriental type of Christianity, they despise its immorality and idolatry, and protest against the creature worship and image worship of both the Greek and Latin Churches. The pagans of the second century objected to Christianity, that it had neither altars nor images; the Moslem of the nineteenth century objects to Christianity that has only altars and images. The Christian missionary to-day urges a Mohammedan to accept Christianity. He is met with the derisive reply: 'Thank God we are not idol worshippers as are you Christians, and, God willing, we will never be.'"

This last remark is significant, and speaks for itself.

Whilst, of course, this paragraph that I have quoted does not deal with the Trinitarian aspect of the question, yet it explains the attitude of Mohammedans to Christianity in general, as naturally they expect that the forms they are familiar with would be typical of the religion in general.

It is not my purpose here to explain away or to defend any of the tenets of the Mohammedan religion, nor do I deny that there is much in it that is superstitious, but to those of your readers who wish to form a reasonable estimate of their religion they cannot do better than read Carlyle's estimate of Mahomet in his "Heroes and Hero Worship," and also Dean Stanley's Lecture on "Mahometanism in its Relations to the Eastern Church."

I should, however, like to draw attention to two important principles which Mahomet worked for; they are:—

1st. "The unity of God," which is the great doctrine of the Koran, and to restore which Mahomet claimed was the chief end of his mission.

2nd. "The protest against idolatry." As an instance of this I think I am right in saying that all representations of living creatures of all kinds and everywhere are prohibited; the very form of Arabesque ornamentation is always taken from inanimate, never from animated nature. The remark of Mr. Sunderland is noteworthy, that:—"Throughout all the leading Mohammedan nations there is a slowly rising tide of new life, new desire to break away from the stagnation of the past, new desire to get in touch with the larger knowledge and thought of Europe and America."

Now bearing this in mind, it seems to me that there should be a splendid field for the circulation of Unitarian literature; the particular kind it would be desirable to circulate we might leave to those having experience in such matters. And now, in conclusion, let me quote the words of the late Dean Stanley, whose name I am sure will be received with respect amongst Unitarians. In the lecture which I have mentioned above, he says:—"The habits of temperance, devotion and resignation which Mohammedan belief encourages may be combined with the grace, the humility, the freedom of the Gospel."

CHRISTIAN DISCIPLESHIP.

SIR,—I have been a regular subscriber to your paper for thirty-five years, and I have nearly thirty bound volumes of it. I can say more. I use extracts from it as "Lessons" to read in my church services, e.g., recently from Dr. Crothers and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

This preface is necessary to a few words I ask you kindly to make public in reference to the Rev. Ambrose Bennett's Essay on "The Origin of Christian Discipleship" in THE INQUIRER of this date, pp. 427-428.

I will not make a cheap protest of dissent, but merely ask your readers a very simple question.

If Mr. Bennett is right in his view of the absolute necessity for a Christ in the spiritual life of man, does it not cut at the very root of our belief in the absolute sufficiency of God our Maker and loving Father?

Moreover, is it possible to feel such dependence on Christ, as Mr. Bennett feels and advocates, without practically raising Christ to the level of Godhead, inasmuch as all the functions ascribed to him by Mr. Bennett are de facto Divine?

THE SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me to correct your report of the few words I said in proposing the toast of success to the Southern Unitarian Association.

I did not say that "the Southern Association was founded at Newport, July 23, 1801," but that the Southern Unitarian Society was founded there and then. I did not say that "on June 28, 1815, the Southern Association Fund was founded," but that the Southern Unitarian Fund Society was founded then, and I also said that these two societies (the Southern Unitarian Society, and the Southern Unitarian Fund Society) were united in 1877 under the title of The Southern Unitarian Association. I am at present collecting materials for an account of the history of these societies, and I should be very glad if any of your readers could help me by sending old reports, &c. The minutes of the two societies are, I fear, beyond recovery.

LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THOUGHT WITHIN THE DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.*

BY PROFESSOR B. D. EERDMANS, D.D., OF LEIDEN.

I WISH to make to you some communications about liberal religious thought within the Dutch Reformed Church. I especially refer to this church, not because I am a member of it, but because it was the Church of the State up to the beginning of the nineteenth century, and still is the most important Church of Protestant Holland. In the beginning of the nineteenth century it lost its old position by the influence of the French Revolution, by which many things were changed in our country and equal rights were granted to the various churches.

I hope you will take some interest in Dutch religious life, for, though our country is small, and though it has lost the political importance it once possessed in times in which the so-called Great Powers suppose that they have a right to govern the fate of mankind, I venture to say that as to liberal religious thought we are not obliged to refer to the glory of the past.

The name of Kuenen is known to many of you. A German scholar called him "the conscience of the science of higher criticism." His eminent learning was of influence not only in Holland but also abroad. Our Tiele still works with youthful strength in the history of religions, and we are proud of him. Our Scholten and Opzoomer were, perhaps, less known abroad, but in Holland they had no smaller reputation than Kuenen and Tiele. In dogmatics and philosophy they were leading masters I do not make these remarks to boast o. the merits of Dutch scholars, but in af meeting like this I feel obliged to mention their names with great thankfulness.

By their influence liberal Christian religion, as we know it now, has been preached from our pulpits since the middle of the nineteenth century. A great number of ministers were converted to the new ideas, and numerous pupils of the Leiden University propagated them all over the country. The new doctrine drew much attention. The churches were filled by large crowds anxious to be informed about it.

People called the new ideas "Modern," and "Modernism" still is the most used name for the liberal religious party in Holland. The contents of the liberal religious faith may be expressed by the words: The belief in the living God, the Father of mankind, whose Spirit is living in the hearts of His children, who is to be served according to the principles of the doctrine of Jesus, our Master.

From the year 1850 to 1870 ministers did their very best in preaching against the old doctrines, and their fighting the common opinions was of great influence among the middle classes and the educated people. I suppose you do not understand how it was possible to deny the truth of the common doctrines, without being expelled by the church government, as for instance happened to your much-esteemed Professor Robertson Smith. The reason is, firstly, that the Dutch Reformed Church does not have bishops or superintendents. It is ruled by a Synod, which chang every year. But if we had possessed bishops, they would not have been able to cavil, as the Church has been on bad terms with its own confession now for nearly three centuries. The doctrine of our Church was fixed by the National Synod at Dordtrecht in 1618. It is chiefly contained in the so-called Dutch Confession in 37 articles, and the Catechism.

The principle of the Confession is that there shall not be anything in it that is not conformable to the Holy Scripture. Very soon after 1618 divergent opinions were preached by ministers, who referred to the Holy Scriptures as justifying them in doing so. Continued study of the Bible and the progress of science became of ever-growing influence. The only way to save the doctrine would have been to convoke a National Synod in order to expel the heretics. But at that time the Church was State-Church and the General States of the Dutch Republic would not give permission.

So it was impossible to convoke a National Synod until 1816, when the new Kingdom of Holland was established. But then the difference of opinions was so great that the Synod did not venture to give any distinct determination of the contents of the doctrine. It obliged the ministers to agree with the principles of the Confession, without saying what these principles were. And so it has remained until to-day. So the actual position is that everybody has to determine for himself whether he agrees with those principles, and that he has to find these in his own way.

Of course a number of orthodox people did not like such regulations. In 1834 adherents of the old confession left the Church and founded a congregation of their own—the so-called Christian Reformed Church. In 1886 a new exodus took place under the well-known Calvinistic politician, the Rev. Dr. Kuyper. In several places they tried to take with them, in addition to their belief of the old confession, the possessions of the parish; and it is not yet forgotten in Holland that Dr. Kuyper and his friends took crowbars and saws, and tried to open, during the night, the money-cases in the new church at Amsterdam. The judge, however, declared they should be content with the belief in the old confession, without any more.

In 1860 the whole Dutch Reformed Church seemed to be gained for liberal thought, and numbers of parishes called liberal ministers. In those days there was no general suffrage. The ministers were called by the vestry, that chose its own members, belonging to the educated middle classes. In 1869, however, the liberals were the cause of their own death by giving the right to vote to every member of age that was happy enough to be a man and not a woman. In consequence of this the influence of the less educated people brought new men into the vestry, and when a minister's place became vacant an orthodox minister was called by them. In many towns the liberal ministers are dying out, or are already gone. It is quite natural that the less educated people should not agree with the new opinions, for during several years denying and negations formed the greater part of a sermon, and in the zeal for denying some ministers forget to edify.

For instance, a well-known journalist in Holland, who has retired from preaching, one Sunday preached a sermon on "Attending Divine Service," and he expatiated on the wrong motives most people had in doing so, and on the uselessness of it. After the service somebody said he had expected to hear something about the right way of attending the service, and of the great blessings this might have. "Yes," was the reply, "you are right, it may be edifying; really I put that down in my notes, but I forgot to speak about it." Such sermons were obnoxious.

Still in many towns the influence of the general suffrage would have been less felt, had not a number of members of the vestry resigned their places as soon as men were elected they did not like as fellow-members. So now in nearly all our towns orthodoxy rules. This could happen the sooner as the church does not have sub-divisions of communities. So, for instance, Amsterdam with some 200,000 of members is one parish, ruled by one vestry.

At this moment the power of the liberals is chiefly in the country. There numerous parishes will not call an orthodox minister. In every parish where orthodoxy rules the liberal minority meets great difficulties. Thus, at Leiden, there are nine ministers, and all belong to the orthodox party. Our repeated request to call a liberal man to one of the posts when vacant has not been granted by the vestry. So we have to pay the church-rates without receiving any help. We assemble every Sunday in a hall, and various ministers from other places come over for preaching, and we have our own teachers for religious instruction. So far as this things go on pretty well; but difficulties arise in the baptising of the children and confirmation. We can hardly take the children or some hundred young people and their families to another place for baptism and confirmation; so the vestry of some liberal community comes to Leiden for these purposes, and this gives rise to endless quarrelling with the Leiden vestry. Such difficulties have caused a great number of liberals to leave our Church and join the small number of liberal communities of Remonstrants and Baptists that bid a hearty welcome to everybody that likes to join them. In doing so they save money and trouble.

Even a considerable number of ministers, tired of struggling with an orthodox vestry, have joined the smaller communities, when they received a call. A good many of the best Remonstrant preachers formerly belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church, and many of them left us, not on account of their struggle with any difficulty, but only for the sake of a better position.

These things have considerably weakened our position in the Church. Our Church has about 1,400 communities, of which some 400 are liberal. In many of the orthodox communities there are considerable liberal minorities. We suppose that one-third of the whole Church may be reckened to be liberal.

If all those members were thoroughly interested in the progress of liberal religious thought it would not be difficult to attain better conditions; but I am sorry to say that a great many of them seem to have very little interest. They do not care for church and religion, at least if you are not inclined to call the opinions they sometimes pretend to have "religion." They are a class of people like the population of Alsace-Lorraine. Now, they are not good Germans, but formerly they were good Frenchmen. In olden times they went to church without caring for religion; now they do not care for religion, and do not go to church.

However many difficulties there may be we do not intend to give up our position in the Church. Not for our own sake—for, happily, we are wise enough to know, as your Sterne says, that the Lord does not ask in what coat we walked on earth, in a Remonstrant one or in a Dutch Reformed one—but for the sake of others, the more simple-minded people, who hold to their Church and are coming now to our services, who are inclined to liberal thought, but would fall back to orthodoxy if left alone. It is a pity that some of our energetic young liberal ministers take little interest in these things. They are influenced by the ideas of Tolstoy, and some of them have even resigned their position to join a Communistic colony living on agriculture near Amsterdam. We should like to have that energy working to our profit.

We are strongly encouraged in good hope for the future by the great influence of liberal religious thought in the so-called "orthodox" circles. An orthodox minister of to-day is quite another man than the orthodox minister of fifty years ago. Of course there is a party that dislikes all new ideas, that holds to the old opinions, but even they could not escape the law of progress. This party is by no means a leading one. The bulk of orthodox ministers agree with the results of Old-Testament criticism, and some of them have already told their brethren to consider it reasonable to criticise the New Testament also. They are most evidently on the way to liberalism. They do not like dogmatics, they say; they look upon the Confession as an old thing to be found in some very old-fashioned hymn-books, and in preaching they never mention it. The deity of Christ is, in fact, the only dogma they use as proof of their orthodoxy. I am sure we might say that many of them have given up even that, if they only would explain in clear words what they mean by the deity of Christ.

This is the blessing of the universal education, which is the only way to the ministry in our church. If the ministers of the Church of England were bound to receive a completer education, if they were obliged to study Hebrew and Greek, in order to be able to read the Bible in the original languages, I think they would be more liberal in their opinions. Our theological students have to pass the examinations of the Universities of the State.

Our Theological Faculties are now quite independent of any church and perfectly free in their teaching. Formerly the theological professors had to be members of the Dutch Reformed Church, but since 1878 this law is withdrawn. Professor Tiele, a member of our Faculty, is a Remonstrant; and his successor (a Norwegian), Professor Brede Kristensen, from Christiania, is a Lutheran. In consequence of this freedom even the so-called orthodox theological professors have most liberal ideas. There is no difference in the teaching of my orthodox colleagues for the Old Testament in the faculties at Utrecht and Gröningen and my teaching. Some students of Gröningen even told me that they were converted to liberalism by the teaching of one of their orthodox professors. At Utrecht one professor denied the Inspiration of the Bible, and another colleague told me that he believed in the deity of Christ only as a symbol of his great importance. We might call those men Unitarians if they dared to speak in the common words instead of in old phrases.

In view of these things I dare to say that this century will see a mighty progress of liberal religious thought. There are sufficient proofs that the majority of the members of the church do not really understand what it is to be orthodox. They judge from external things. A minister is looked upon as good orthodox if in the services he asks the people to sing psalms and no other hymns.

I once preached for a friend of mine and gave a liberal sermon. Some weeks afterwards I received a call to an orthodox community near the place where my friend lived. This was astonishing to me; but I learned by information that some of the members of that vestry attended that service. I accidentally had taken the hymns only from the psalms, and so they supposed me to be orthodox!

We have good hope. In places were we are the majority we are already perfectly free; for our service consists only of singing and the delivery of a sermon. No Creed is read, no confessions answered to; we are free in using the old ritual. If we like it we may do so; if we do not like it, we are allowed to make our own ritual.

So there is actually no difference between us and the Remonstrants, Mennonites, and the liberal Lutherans. No walls of different doctrine separate us. The various ministers very often preach in the churches of other congregations. One day we must come to a great union of all those churches. The time for that is not yet come. There are too many circumstances prohibiting it now; and one of these is that liberal religious thought is not popular enough among the bulk of the members of some churches. The people are not yet ripe for it. This is a matter of generations and not of years. We must go on working, teaching, and preaching. In looking forward to this future, we know that we are not working for the glory of our own particular ideas; we are impelled by the deep conviction that it is only a pure and free faith in the living God, who loves all His creatures, that can give mankind happiness and peace.

THE UNITARIAN WORK IN THE KHASI HILLS, INDIA.

The fifth anniversary meetings of the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union took place at Jowai on April 6, 7, and 8, 1901. On Saturday evening there was a welcome meeting of the delegates and friends of the Union. The following churches were represented:—Jowai, by U. Khro Shyrngang; Nongtalang, by U. Khyllaw Padu; Raliang, by the Rev. David Edwards; Shillong, by U. Singbor; Laitlyngkot, by Mynjra Singh.

Early on Sunday morning there was a devotional service. There were two sermon meetings at 10 A.M. and 1 P.M. The preachers were the Rev. David Edwards, Babu Radhon Singh Berry, of the Shillong Brahmo Somaj; U. Khyllaw of Nongtalang and U. Singbor, of Shillong. Resolutions were passed expressing sympathy with the members of the bereaved Royal Family on account of the death of our beloved Empress Victoria, and sending loyal congratulations and obeisance to His Majesty King Edward VII., Emperor of India, on his accession to the Throne. The resolutions were subsequently duly acknowledged by the Secretary to the Chief Commissioner of Assam.

In the afternoon there was a singing and preaching procession through the thoroughfares of Jowai, after which was a conference of Unitarian women. In the evening there was a meeting of the Board of the Union, in which the constitution and rules of the Union were revised.

On Monday morning there was a business meeting. Among others the following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

1. Resolved that the members and delegates and friends of the Unitarians' Union, Khasi Hills, send their greetings to the Unitarians in the British Islands, America, and in all parts of the world.
2. Send their greetings and sympathy to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.
3. Send their greetings and sympathy to the Brahmos of all sections.
4. Send their greetings and loving remembrance to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland and the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams.
5. Do express their deep feelings of gratitude to the members and friends of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for their continued support and interest in the Unitarian mission work in the Khasi Hills.

At noon there was a Board meeting again, in which the reports from the churches, the report of the Committee, the report of the Unitarian day-school, and the accounts of the Mission and the Union funds were read, and other business connected with the Union's work was transacted. The contribution from the members and churches to the Union in 1900 amounted to 63 rupees. The permanent Mission Fund had amounted to 384 rupees. There were on the roll 228 Unitarians, with sixteen unpaid preachers and four paid workers in December, 1900.

There was an anniversary meeting of the children's service during the day, conducted by elder boys.

In the evening there was a lecture on "Our Duty to the Children to bring them up in the Liberal Faith," and several leading Unitarians took part in the discussion of the subject.

The surest way to enlighten and to rouse the spiritual energy of our ignorant hill people is by establishing schools among them. The Unitarian school at Jowai had sixty-nine students, of whom thirty were Unitarian children. The teaching staff consisted of three teachers. The monthly expenditure of the school staff was Rs. 55, or about £50 a year, or half of the amount of grant made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for mission work in the Khasi Hills. The school is in need of intelligent teachers of our own faith.

We are in sore need of trained preachers to take charge of our churches. We now employ raw recruits for the work.

Everyone in the meetings felt that a European missionary is most pressingly needed to be our teacher to train up young men to be preachers, and to be our leader and minister. The meetings were characterised by a feeling of unity and enthusiasm among the members, and by a determination to work more for the spread of the Unitarian faith in the Khasi Hills. Our motto is "To nangroi," that is, Go forward.

LITERATURE.

INTER AMICOS.*

THIS is a book of rare interest. "Inter Amicos," or "Between Friends," consists mainly of letters exchanged many years ago between Professor William Knight, then a young Professor at St. Andrews of rapidly-rising reputation, and our own James Martineau, already among the elders and of a great fame wherever high and devout religious thought was valued.

The young man has been drawn greatly to the elder, attracted by the noble beauty of his writings and the deep and deliberate wisdom of his thought. Yet he is of a highly-orthodox Church, and himself holds, both by affection and by reasoning, the central orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation, of the combined deity and humanity of Jesus Christ, of the plurality of Persons in the Eternal God. And with a young man's longing to come to an understanding with an old man whom he ardently reveres, he boldly invites Mr. Martineau to a detailed discussion of the deep differences in theology and philosophy which divide them. And Martineau, with rare courtesy and generosity, complies, and reasons out his thought of God and Christ in letters written with no idea that they would ever fall under any other eyes than the keen eyes of this young Scotchman. And now that the veteran has passed away, and every word of his is treasured, Professor Knight gives us the correspondence, or such parts of it as survive, since, alas! he has lost at least one letter of his friend, which one would judge to have been of surpassing interest and value.

Professor Knight's own share in the interchange of argument is full of thoughtfulness and earnestness, and he has a noble passage on spiritual fellowship, not apart from, but actually fed and enriched by intellectual divergency. And very early he plunges into that dilemma of which we have heard much of late, "how the divine love could have been an everlasting reality, outflowing from a Divine centre, except on the theory of an eternal duality within the Divine Nature itself" (p. 13).

In a long letter written from the house of his friend, Thomas Ainsworth, at Pitlochrie, on July 25, 1870, Mr. Martineau addresses himself straight to his correspondent's difficulty and his mode of solving it. And first of all he points out how the whole doctrine of the Incarnation rests on the assumption that the Gospel according to St. John is not, as criticism seems to him to indicate, "a free product of the Christian genius in the middle of the second century,"† but a rigidly historical report of the life and words of Jesus. "Accordingly," says he, "I observe that the authenticity, or the historical trustworthiness of the Fourth Gospel, practically stands as an article in the creed of this theological school; and it is not without a most important reservation"—the reservation, namely, of that Gospel from the crucible of criticism—"that they can announce a theology which is lifted above the contingencies of historical criticism" (p. 23). If that Gospel be not a faithful report of the language of Christ, then the doctrine of the Incarnation is bereft of New Testament support.

And it is not altogether with regret that Martineau sees the Jesus of that Gospel dissolved into the imaginings of a later age. For while he shares with Mr. Knight his profound veneration for the character ascribed to Jesus in most of its elements, yet he finds elements in that Gospel which seem to him rather to mar than to adorn the portrait.

> One or two of the characteristics (he writes)—precisely those most essential to your inference—the self-assertion—the unindebtedness to the past—the purpose of uniting all the world in a federation by uniting them to himself—are to me (1) not beautiful, (2) not historical; nor do I think that the true image of what he was is reached till he is divested of the whole dress which the Messianic mythology and Alexandrine theosophy have thrown around him in our Gospels. This done the figure (he continues) which emerges* is to my eye simply human—of ideal strength and beauty—the purest model of the relation between God and the soul of man; but with no apprehensible element transcending our inner scale of spiritual possibility (pp. 24, 25).

That is to say our great teacher, with all his profound reverence for Jesus, saw nothing in his nature save human nature, nothing in his relation to God to which it is not morally possible for all men to attain.

And if he is asked to account for one human being so far transcending the actual spiritual attainment of other men, he at once declines the task. We never can, in his opinion, lay our hands on the causes of the exceptional character of individuals, whether they be demoniacally bad or divinely good. But to make our failure to explain such character "a reason for resorting to a solution by either 'possession' or 'incarnation'" seems to him without any justification (p. 25). He will not take refuge in the theory that Satan has taken up his abode in the sinner, or that God is enshrined in the flesh of the saint.

And then Martineau goes on to expose the futility of the expedient of providing an eternal object for the love of God by distinguishing different elements or persons within His being, an expedient to which I have lately more than once had occasion to refer. "The mutual love of two Gods," he declares that he can understand; "but not the mutual love of two functions, factors, or relations of one God" (p. 26). All real affection goes forth to one outside the person who feels that affection. If both the lover and the loved are one, then the very "selfishness" and "solitude" which Professor Knight seeks to avoid for God are there in all their ugliness. That the objects of God's love should be within God's own being would reduce His love to self-love and afford no field at all for that divine and sublime affection which we strive to realise under the name of the love of God.

But his correspondent had suggested that the "two-foldness" in God, the union of two elements, the lover and the loved, "is not arithmetical but moral." To which Martineau rejoins that "in order to be moral it must be arithmetical, all moral relations implying a plurality of persons." "Indeed," he adds with that trenchant common sense which ever and again wedges itself in between his most finely-wrought reflections, "of number that is not numerical I can form no idea."

But our teacher, continuing this noble letter, goes on to compare God as revealed to us in the outer world, the physical make of the universe, with God as revealed to us in the ethical nature of man and the oracles of moral authority with which He speaks to us in the silent chambers of the soul. God as Creator and Sustainer of the visible worlds is wonderful, but it is not His loftiest aspect. Only in the experiences of the conscience is He first revealed to us as the "Spiritual and Transcendent God."

And God, says Martineau, could never want for objects of His love while there are worlds peopled with intellectual and spiritual beings. And he presses strenuously for the acknowledgment that we are indeed sons of God quite apart from and independently of any special relation in which theology may conceive Jesus Christ to stand to God. He cannot understand why men are so reluctant to admit this normal and universal relation of men to God as children to a Father. "That such sonship is impossible without an eternal and incarnate Son," he declares to be "a proposition wholly unintelligible" to him. "Since men," says he, "'in the image of God' would in any case really be his sons, why it should be out of the question for them to recognise this relation, and be brought to dispositions accordant with it, I cannot see." (P. 31.)

"The more," writes he at last, "I reflect on these things, the more profoundly convinced I am that the idea of an historical Incarnation affords no permanent standing-ground for a Religious Philosophy." He looks upon that doctrine indeed as having served as a "transitory means" of keeping alive in the minds and hearts of men "the supreme truth . . . of the life of God in the soul of man." And with the sentiments that cluster round the doctrine he owns himself in deep and tender sympathy. (P. 32.) He finds the hymns and prayers of many an orthodox Church speaking to him "in the tones of a home-music." "But," says he, "I cannot think with them, and my wonder at their creed increases from year to year."

At a moment when a vigorous effort has been made to enlist the high authority of Dr. Martineau in support of a doctrine of Incarnation as the central thought of the Christian religion, it is a happy coincidence that brings to our eyes this careful and earnest letter, written without thought of any public audience in the confidence and freedom of friendly correspondence with one who pressed him for his inmost thinking on this severe and lofty theme.

A later letter in the correspondence deals with a very different topic, a topic, however, in which Dr. Martineau always felt the keenest interest, and thought deeply, clearly and, to my mind, most convincingly—I mean the matter of subscription to theological creeds and the honourable obligations imposed by such subscription. The question arose out of the fact that Professor Knight had preached at Little Portland-street Chapel, and had been summoned before his Presbytery for the offence. He wrote in consequence an article on "The Ethics of Creed-Subscription," which appeared in the Contemporary Review, and which he sent to Martineau; and in a letter written from Beddgelert, in August, 1872, Dr. Martineau throws himself with his wonted zest into the discussion of the problem raised. He is full of sympathy on the one hand with his correspondent's breadth of religious view, as also on the other with the clinging of his heart to the church of his fathers, the Free Kirk of Scotland, based as it is on the most rigid Calvinistic definitions. But he can see no honourable reconciliation between anti-Calvinistic preaching and retention of a post of trust in a Calvinistic Church. To subscribe a creed is to sign a contract: in consideration of the subscriber teaching certain doctrines he is to have such countenance and office as the Church can give him. The contract is as binding in honour as any contract in buying and selling goods. If it be contended that it was a wrong contract to make, then the proper course is not to break it, retaining its rewards, but to withdraw from it, giving up the office at the same moment that you refuse its obligations. They who laid down the conditions certainly expected a bonâ fide assent to the creeds imposed; they had no conception of that gradual growth and enlargement of religious thought on which the young Scottish professor dwells; and he who wishes freely to enjoy that growth and that enlargement must first withdraw from the bargain he has made to keep his thinking within the ancient confines. And Dr. Martineau states very bluntly the moral effect of the opposite procedure.

The feeling with which honourable and high-minded laymen are beginning to look at the liberal clergy as men who conform and know better, and who introduce evasions into the highest offices of life, is at once natural and disastrous. The intellectual sympathy which is felt for them perplexes, without satisfying, the moral estimate of their position: and I perceive everywhere the suspicion spreading that somehow Religion can always command a store of Academic subtleties, which, if not needed for defence of absurd doctrine, can be used in excuse for questionable action. (P. 85.)

And then this great chieftain in the battle for an honest churchmanship goes on to expose the historical inaccuracy of that strange, but very common, contention that a Church can only be reformed from within.

I am not aware (he writes) of any Church that—in the sense required, of altering a dogmatic basis—has ever reformed itself, either from within or from without. Every great birth or revolution of dogma—i.e., every one great enough to require new creeds—has had to constitute a new Church as its organ. The Church of Rome would not take up the Anglican modifications; or the Anglican adopt the Puritan, the Quaker, the Wesleyan; the Lutherans had to separate from the Catholics, and themselves would not make room for the Reformed; and so on, all round. Every one of these separate Churches retains to this hour its doctrinal symbols as settled in the crisis of its first growth; the only variations being the mere wavering of the forces which moulded it before it fully set, and not modifications arising from later developments. The new wine has always required new bottles. It is not to Erasmus, but to Luther, that God has given the modern world. (Pp. 86, 87.)

Such are the two main themes of the correspondence on Martineau's side—the doctrine of Incarnation, from which, being asked for definite and fundamental statement, he unreservedly cuts himself off; and the ethics of subscription and conformity, in which he declines to admit the plea for leave to depart from the formulæ of a Church while still in enjoyment of its offices. There is the sparkle of his wonderful play of expression over other topics also. But it is these that are the gist and grist of his letters, and it is these that give the book its value. Then follows that remarkable address—with its full roll of signatures—which Professor Knight himself initiated in greeting to the veteran when he reached his eighty-third birthday, and the roll is found to comprise almost all the brightest and noblest names in contemporary literature and philosophy. There follow, too, Professor Knight's own sermon at Little Portland-street Chapel and his article on the Ethics of Subscription in the Contemporary Review. Indeed, in quantity the volume comprises much more of Knight than of Martineau, and in any other companionship his contributions would seem of considerable interest and weight. But he is outmeasured by his friend; and we feel that his greatest service has been to elicit from the master these memorable letters and to present them now in the ripeness of time to the outside world.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—The views I expressed a fortnight ago on the late Education Bill apply equally to the new Bill, and, in my opinion, this apparently small and temporary measure, so far from being of little importance, demands the most earnest consideration that we can give to it. We must look below the surface to discover its purpose. It is not a mere question of tiding over a year under one or another educational authority in the matter of the "Cockerton" judgment. It goes far deeper and much further. By a sidewind it aims at prejudging a great controversy to be fought out next year. In this little Bill sanction is sought from Parliament for the degradation of School Boards with a view to their subsequent suppression. That is as clear as day. We cannot enter on this discussion, as to the relative merits of School Boards and Committees of County Councils, as if we were back at the year 1870 once more. Then the whole subject was new, and the ground was unoccupied. The original Bill, as introduced by Mr. Forster, was drawn on the lines of the election of the School Boards by the Town Councils; and the National Education League, through its Chairman, Mr. George Dixon, M.P., adhered to that mode of their election, and divided the House on it, after the Government had accepted Sir Charles Dilke's amendment in favour of direct election by the people. Much was to be said then, as much may be said now, on either side on the matter. But when, for thirty years, the School Boards have occupied the field, and have honourably and usefully fulfilled their duties, and have done very much to raise the character of elementary education, they cannot be superseded without grave injustice being done them. It would be a serious indignity put upon them, in the shape of a national vote of want of confidence wholly undeserved. The great School Boards have deserved well of their country; and it would be nothing less than a public scandal, if, at the instance of Sir John Gorst, with his "flouts and jibes," they were sent about their business. As a matter of fact, the mischief is that they have done their work, not too ill, but too well for their unsuccessful rivals, the denominationalists.

And the very sin for which they are now undergoing punishment, and for which they are threatened with extinction, is that, at a time when the one thing needed for the very life of the nation is a ladder from the elementary to the secondary and technical schools, they are raising that ladder in their higher grade and evening continuation schools. Instead of "Hands off!" "Go on and prosper!" should be the nation's cry. And, with the general consent as to the desirability of having only one authority for all this education, the School Board has unquestionably the first claim to the position. It is elected for education and no other purpose, while County Councils will have an immense field of duty left them without this in addition, well as they have done their share of this work. My friend, Mr. Ellis, like Mr. Rawson, with the knowledge of long experience, bears testimony to this. No one denies it, or fails in recognition of the services thus rendered to education. But I must say that I think the Northampton County Councillors, who have just expressed their strong objection to assuming the new duties proposed to them, were more alive than Mr. Ellis to the dangers in store for them in the possible introduction of the religious difficulty and the sectarian spirit into their midst, if they should in future become the authorities for elementary as well as secondary education. Happily it has not yet entered the latter domain; but it is the home of the former. And evidence accumulates that the whole animus of the proposed legislation is to be found in the aim to capture the rates for denominational schools. This year the new authority is to be elected pro tem.; next year it is to be made permanent, and to be empowered to deal with elementary as well as secondary education, and to give aid to denominational schools from the rates. School Boards cannot give denominationalists what they want. The National Education League, with Mr. Chamberlain as chairman of its executive, won that victory thirty-one years ago for the Nonconformists, just as it won the insertion of the Cowper-Temple Clause forbidding the use of catechisms and formularies distinctive of particular religious sects. In both these matters the Bill had "given away" the Nonconformists. It empowered the Boards to aid denominational schools from the rates, and to teach in the Board Schools the religious beliefs of the majority.

Against these provisions a furious battle was fought by the great body of dissenters, and was won, as we thought, for ever. But now the struggle is on us once more. We must fight it out to the last ditch, rather than submit to denominationalism, clericalism, and ecclesiasticism, endowed by rates, to be spent without control by irresponsible sectarian managers, in the interest, not so much of education, as of their churches and their shibboleths.

Reaction all along the line is the order of the day. Here the School Board is the citadel singled out for attack by the reactionists; it is the fort to be held at all hazards. If the denominationalists win this battle this year by their dangerous little Bill, next year they will try to crown their victory by the slaughter of the School Boards, which to-day they only insult and degrade. And instead of a prospect of a truly national system of public education, we shall be confronted with the imminent danger of losing what we already have of it, and of seeing denominationalism advancing from victory to victory to the lasting injury of the education of the people.

In reference to the area of the School Boards' operations, I will add that I am entirely at one with Mr. Rawson and Mr. Ellis. I desire the county, rather than the small borough, or rural district, area. Indeed, I think there is a general consensus on these points — namely, one authority, large areas, and abolition of the cumulative vote with its invitation to sectarian representation.

HUNGARIAN TOUR.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—The arrangements for the tour are now complete. Mr. Jozan and Miss Buzogany are prepared to meet the party in Vienna and Budapest, and show them all that is of interest in those cities with as little fatigue as possible, and to plan interesting excursions. The journey is planned so that two fatiguing days should not follow each other. Therefore a night's rest will be taken at Dresden, and the journey through Bohemia and by the banks of the Elbe will be made in daylight. Prague will be visited on the return journey from Vienna to Dresden. Mr. Jozan thinks it would be very interesting to spend the day in Presburg, and break the railway journey on the way to Budapest. Mr. Boros is most anxious to give a hospitable welcome to all the Unitarians who will visit Kolozsvár on the occasion of the opening of the New Unitarian College Buildings. He even goes so far as to offer free hospitality for the week to be spent there, besides fêtes and beautiful excursions to places of interest in the neighbourhood. This tour has been arranged at the request of one or two Unitarian ministers, and it will be a great disappointment to all concerned if a sufficient number of names are not given in before Aug. 1 to enable the agreement with the railway company to be carried out, and the return journey to Vienna made at the cost of a single fare.

Both in Budapest and in Kolozsvár there is an English-speaking club, called after the great Protestant Reformer the Francis David Club, and these are the people who desire to welcome the English Unitarians. The excursion will start on Friday, Aug. 23. All applications for further particulars and tickets should be made to the hon. sec., Hungarian Tour, 13, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, N.W. £14 must be paid beforehand, and the total cost should not exceed from £18 to £20.

M. LUCY TAGART.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Sir Thomas More.

NOT long ago I was passing the church of St. Lawrence Jewry, near the Guildhall, and I went in to see it. A wedding was going on, so I stood by the great screen and looked round. The first thing I noticed was the great window on my left, which, as I looked at it, became more interesting to me than the wedding.

In the middle of this window was the life-size figure of a man wearing a long furred gown and cap, and on each side was a picture of a house. One was a City house gabled and timbered, and one a wide country house with gardens sloping to a river, with a lake and paths. And beneath it said that this window was in memory of Sir Thomas More, and it told these four things about him: that he was Member for Finsbury; that he had lectured in the church; that he wrote "Utopia"; that he suffered July 6, 1535. And you might try and remember these four things of him.

But I am only going to write of two. These two houses are meant for the two in which he lived—one in Bucklersbury, the other in Chelsea, which was country then. And they made me think of what endears him to us more than his great talents, or his learning, or his brilliant wit, or the part he played in public life—or, perhaps, because it was joined with these—I mean his home life.

In this Chelsea house there lived with him wife and children and grandchildren, twenty-one people. That was a large houseful to live together happily and kindly, wasn't it? Don't you think it would have been very easy to find something to find fault with in each other, or to quarrel over, every day? Well, this is how a man who lived in this household a great deal describes their life:—

"More has built him," he says, "near London, upon the Thames, a modest yet commodious mansion. There he lives, surrounded by his family, including his wife, his son and his wife, his three daughters and their husbands, and eleven grandchildren. There is not any man living so affectionate as he; and he loveth his old wife as if she were a girl of fifteen. In this house is none, man or woman, but readeth or studieth the liberal arts, yet is their chief care of piety. There is never any seen idle. The head of the house governs it, not by a lofty carriage and oft rebukes, but by gentleness and amiable manners. Every member is busy in his place, performing his duty with alacrity, nor is sober mirth wanting."

Think over a moment what made this home so happy. Everyone had something to do in it. Everyone had some interest or study to bring to enlarge and refine it. The father was always gentle, affectionate, polite, so that the whole household caught his temper. And then the sense of God the great Father rested over all, and gave joy to all. And so instead of a clashing, fretful, scolding, indolent, or dull houseful, it was a busy-looking, helpful houseful, merry and gay. And these are the very things that make homes happy now, just as they did four centuries ago—poor homes or rich homes, small families or large ones. The pleasure of work, the pleasure of learning, the pleasure of loving, the pleasure of reverence and trust, these still make homes happy; nor, indeed, can home be happy without them.

This beautiful home life, then, is the first thing I want you to remember about Sir Thomas More.

And now I will miss out all about his learning and his success, and the great offices he held, and his part in the great world outside his home. I will go on to the last thing the window said about him; because, like his home-life, that is something the youngest of us may understand. "He suffered on July 6, 1535." That means that he was beheaded as a traitor on Tower Hill. It means that there came a time in his life when he had to choose whether he would keep his high place—and the favour of the King—whether he would keep his beautiful home, and the loves and joys that made it so sweet, at the price of saying something he didn't believe—or whether he would be true though it cost him his life to be so.

First he gave up his high office, and went home to live in quiet. He had time to think it all over. Did he sometimes think to himself that it made no difference—that the King would do as he liked in any case? Did he sometimes ask, Why should I hold out when all the bishops and great men have given in? The oath is only a form—why shouldn't I take it, and think as I please? What will my family do without me?

One of his friends, the Duke of Norfolk, warned him of his danger. "The anger of the monarch," he said, "means death." "Is that all?" said More; "then there is no more difference between your Grace and me, than that I shall die to-day and you to-morrow."

At last he was summoned to Lambeth to take the oath, and his son-in-law, William Roper, has told us of that sad scene. "Whereas," he says, "Sir Thomas More used evermore at his departure from his house and children (whom he loved tenderly) to have them bring him to his boat, and there to kiss them all and bid them farewell, at this time would he suffer none of them forth of the gate to follow him, but pulled the wicket after him, and shut them all from him, and with a heavy heart (as by his countenance it appeared) with me and our four servants then took his boat toward Lambeth. Wherein, sitting still sadly the while, at last he rounded me in the ear, and said, 'Son Roper, I thank our Lord, the field is won.'"

Some day you will read, I hope, the story of the courage and cheerfulness with which he bore his long imprisonment, and met his death. His life and his death were of one piece.

In one of the chapters of Revelation are two verses that come to my mind when I think of this brave death:—"To him that overcometh will I give of the hidden manna" (that means, the inward unseen consolations and strength which come to faithful souls in such hours of trial); and, "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God—to go out no more" (which means that such men are the supports of truth and justice in this world, and hold up like pillars our faith in them, and our courage and our hope amid our own temptations).

LONDON, JULY 20, 1901.

A UNITARIAN CONFESSOR.

"The Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, vicar of this place for ten years, voluntarily resigned, not from infirmities of age, but out of a principle of conscience, Nov. 28, 1773. A Christian devout, learned and ingenuous, and a great benefactor of this place."

IT was worth a pilgrimage to the far north of Yorkshire to be able to read that entry in an old baptismal register in Catterick Church, and to receive the volume open at that page from the friendly hand of the present vicar of the parish. The pilgrims, whose commemorative meeting at Catterick, on Saturday, July 13, we have this week recorded, are not likely soon to forget their gathering in the old church and in the vicarage, where they were privileged to enter the rooms which were once the scene for ten years of THEOPHILUS LINDSEY'S happy and beneficent life, where he and his wife on Sunday evenings, before the days of Sunday-schools, gathered the children of the parish for religious instruction, and where he fought through that inward conflict which made him a brave confessor and sufferer for conscience sake.

There CATHARINE HARRISON, who afterwards married the venerable NEWCOME CAPPE, minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel, York, was staying when LINDSEY returned home from London in 1772, after the failure of the Feathers' Tavern petition, praying Parliament for a relaxation of the terms of subscription. She knew that the disappointment of that hope meant for LINDSEY an irrevocable determination, and that he must leave the Church, whose formularies he could no longer honestly use. She tells in her memoirs of the bitterness this trial brought to him, and with what dejection he returned to the home from which he would so soon have to go out to face an unknown future.

Never can I forget his altered looks, and depressed countenance—his very recollection seemed to be impaired, as he answered our anxious inquiries about his health, as he feebly ascended the few steps leading from the garden to the entrance; "how is all this," he said—"can one indispensable duty ever really be incompatible with another?" We did everything in our power to soothe and calm his mind; and, in a very few days, he was enabled to recover his usual serenity. This was in truth "his hour of darkness," but it happily soon passed away.

LINDSEY has himself recorded what that trial was to him. Before he finally left Catterick in December, 1773, he wrote to a friend :—

Though at first I was hardly master of myself to do anything properly, all such trials are now over. I have found great difficulty and opposition already, and expect to find more. My greatest comfort and support under God is my wife, who is a Christian indeed, and worthy of a better fate in all worldly things than we can have a prospect of. For we leave a station of ease and abundance, attended with many other agreeable circumstances. Thanks be to God, we have not given way to ease and indulgence, and can be content with little.

And when the Rev. WILLIAM TURNER, of Wakefield, offered to recommend him to the congregation of the Octagon Chapel in Liverpool, then without a minister, LINDSEY wrote in reply :—

My design is to try to gather a Church of Unitarian Christians out of the Established Church, and when I go to town, which will be in the beginning of the winter, I shall do all I can to forward it. My duty is to lead those who are in the darkness I was brought up in, to worship the One True God, and not to attach myself to those who are already free from darkness. As to our future provision, now and then I feel gloomy, but no doubt our own industry and the friends God raises up will furnish what is needful.

So he went forth, determined not to accept any easier release, but at any cost to do the special work to which he was called, and to bear his witness to the truth. When his sacrifice was made, his furniture and the greater part of his library sold, and he and his heroic wife had come up to London, and taken some poor rooms near Holborn, waiting until the way should open for the establishment of his Unitarian services, he wrote in his journal :—

I have not known such quiet of mind and perfect peace with God for many years till now, and I would not exchange it for a thousand worlds.

This was "the Christian devout, learned and ingenuous," whom the humble folk at Catterick knew so well, of whom Mrs. CAPPE also relates in her memoirs that after the fate of the Feathers' Tavern petition was decided, "anxious as he was to return, oppressed by disappointment, and harassed by fatigue, he yet took the trouble, on the morning of his leaving town, of going to the Tower, to purchase a quantity of new half-pence, to be given to the poor children, as rewards for taking their medicines."

To this humble and faithful man friends rallied, and his sacrifice was not in vain. Those who joined the recent pilgrimage to Catterick were right in doing honour to his memory. They naturally recalled the text of his first sermon in Essex-street after he had left the Church: "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace," and it was a very pleasant sign of the times that the present vicar of the parish, in his reception of his heretical visitors, manifested a spirit of warm-hearted charity, in complete harmony with that religious ideal. Seven years hence another natural occasion for fitting commemoration will be offered by the centenary of LINDSEY'S death.

THEOPHILUS LINDSEY.

A MEMORIAL ADDRESS AT CATTERICK, SATURDAY, JULY 13.

BY THE REV. FRANK WALTERS.

"The memory of Theophilus Lindsey, fragrant as Sharon's Rose; the Remembrance of his sacrifices for Christian Truth is sweet even in death."

THIS sentiment to which he was to speak, Mr. Walters said, was that proposed by the Rev. George Harris, on the occasion of an earlier pilgrimage to Catterick in August, 1849. Those who remembered Mr. Harris would hear the tones of his voice in the words of that sentiment, which for his own part he gladly accepted. He then proceeded as follows :—

We are a company of Unitarians, who have gathered on a pilgrimage to do honour to a most distinguished Unitarian minister—a man who, more than a hundred years ago, rendered enduring service to the faith we hold most precious. By his splendid self-sacrifice Theophilus Lindsey made Unitarianism a force in the religious life of England. By his invincible courage he maintained the claims of conscience above those of expediency and compromise. By his biblical scholarship he defended Christianity against ecclesiastical corruptions of the Gospel. By his public ministry he enforced the unsophisticated worship of One God the Father. And by the exalted integrity of his personal character, his became one of the brightest names in the Calendar of our Saints and Martyrs.

We have done well to make our pilgrimage to this Yorkshire village. We might have visited his tomb in Bunhill Fields, and held our commemoration meeting within the building which he raised near the Strand as the first Unitarian Chapel in London. But, I am sure, it is much more impressive to gather in the place made sacred by his mental struggles, his spiritual triumph, and his final renunciation of worldly ambitions at the shrine of truth. We have just had the privilege of gathering in the House of God, where he resigned his priesthood in a great historic Church of which (if he could have remained within its communion) he would, most probably, have become one of the most distinguished prelates. The Anglican Church lost a most dignified, devoted, and learned bishop; we, Unitarians, gained a noble Confessor of our Faith. We have been standing on the memorable spot, where he severed the sacred associations of the past, and went forth a wanderer, not knowing whither he went. He set forth on his unknown way, certain only that he would meet with reproach from dearest friends, with censure from many who endorsed his views, and with persecution from foes who misrepresented his motives. But, none of these things moved him. He counted neither reputation nor life dear to him, so that he might be found faithful—and he was found faithful even unto death.

In our theological debates, to-day, we may not always feel warranted in using the plain, outspoken language employed, so many years ago, by such men as Lindsey, and Priestley, and Belsham. The evolution of Philosophic Thought, during the last century, has had the profoundest influence upon the symbolic expression of Christian Faith. Exegesis can work wonders, and I am told of men who can read the Athanasian Creed without a qualm, since they have persuaded themselves that "person" does not really mean person, and that "everlasting" does not really mean everlasting. The task of putting new wine into old bottles has been raised to a fine art in theological controversy. Certainly, during the last century, our theological terminology has been greatly modified. A so-called Trinitarian may, very likely, prove to be a thoroughgoing Unitarian, endowed with a miraculous gift of manipulating language. The stately Church consecrated by the name of the Tri-personal God may echo, every Sunday, with eloquent expositions of a purely Theistic Faith. A more subtle metaphysic has enabled theologians to interpret the old creeds in conformity with modern thought. They prove, to their own satisfaction, that Trinitarian formulas can be mentally adjusted to Theistic worship, and that the ascription of Deity to Christ can be reconciled with belief in the personal unity of the Godhead. No such metaphysical glosses were possible in the theological discussions of the eighteenth century. I never remember hearing a modern Unitarian minister describe the worship of Christ as "idolatry"—and such a description would be regarded as a violation of theological courtesy. But to Lindsey the worship of any created being, even of the most exalted Son of God, was regarded as idolatry, and idolatry he called it. In the year 1792 he wrote a book called "Conversations upon Christian Idolatry," in which he explained the use of this term. He denied any suggestion that Trinitarian worship was associated with the vice and immorality of ancient heathenism; but he maintained that idolatry consists in paying divine honours to a creature, and that such idolatry dishonoured and degraded the Almighty and Infinite Being. Lindsey was a most dignified and courteous gentleman; but in his theological controversies he never hesitated to use the plainest language to express his thought. He was bound to the Anglican Church by family connection, by education, by the by friendly patronage of noble friends, and the sacred duties of his pastoral office. But the conviction deepened within his mind, that the Trinitarian formulas of the Church involved its worshippers in a violation of the First Commandment: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." And, to free himself from complicity in such idolatry, he came out from his own country and his Father's house, to witness to the solemn truth of the Unity of God, and to the claim of the Father of Spirits to the undivided worship of mankind.

The secession of Lindsey was a fine example of unflinching fidelity to the ethics of intellect. It would have been so easy to have made out a case for conformity as the highest duty. Domestic responsibility, parochial service, social usefulness, personal sentiment, sacred bonds of friendship—all these provided powerful motives to plead against the burden which truth had laid upon him. A weaker man would soon have sophisticated his conscience, and would even have persuaded himself that he ought to sacrifice private convictions, in order to save others from the pain that was sure to be caused by the bold affirmation of his Unitarian faith. Why should he disturb his Church, grieve his friends, and perplex the minds of simple believers in his flock?

But Lindsey was a man of singular directness and completeness of character. His career is an illustration of that fine sentiment—

> I could not love thee, dear, so much,
> Loved I not honour more.

To have been unfaithful to his own most solemn convictions would have caused such a disruption of his moral nature as to have invalidated every other duty of home, friendship, and social service. Such was the organic integration of his character that one touch of unfaithfulness would have proved the dishonour of his whole life. He could only serve his brethren by an absolute surrender to the Lord of Truth.

Integrity, that is the word which best describes his distinguishing virtue. It was simply impossible for him to think one faith in private, and profess another faith in public. To employ a Trinitarian formula in the most solemn offices of worship, after he had become convinced of the absolute Unity of God, appeared to him as an act of spiritual treachery. To worship Christ as God, when he believed in his simple humanity, was Idolatry; that was the word which settled the matter. Not all the appeals which endeavoured to present conformity as duty could persuade him that he ought to yield to a form of idolatry dishonouring to the One God, the Eternal Father.

And, as a disciple of Christ himself, he believed that such idolatry was forbidden. Christ was a Great Monotheist; the very object of his mission was to establish, confirm, and proclaim the supreme truth of the Unity and Fatherhood of God. It is most interesting to notice how these convictions were deepened by a careful study of the Bible. To him the Bible was more than a human literature; it contained a supernatural revelation of God to the world; and the one chief employment of Protestant private judgment was the interpretation of Scripture to discover what that revelation really was. He was a constant and scholarly student of the Bible. If there was any personal bias in his mind, it must have been in favour of the doctrines and practice of the Church of England. But, more and more clearly, it dawned upon him that the dogmas of the Tri-personality of God and the Deity of Christ were only to be found in the human creed, and could never be deduced from the Divine Word. The Christianity of Christ was purely monotheistic; the doctrine of the Trinity had never been taught by the first disciples. One text of scripture shone from out the sacred pages and completely fascinated his mind:—"To us there is but One God the Father," and the whole divine disclosure became a confirmation of that one central truth.

This discovery of the teaching of scripture as Unitarian was to Lindsey, personally, a source of joy and comfort; it cleared away many perplexing difficulties from his thought of God; it dissolved the confusions of worship, it simplified every act of devotion and prayer. But, in regard to the other matters, this discovery suggested the most serious difficulties in the adjustment of his personal faith to his official duties. That was the question for him to decide—Was it possible to remain in a Trinitarian Church, holding a Unitarian Faith? And we must remember that the disabilities attaching to the profession of Unitarianism, at that time, were of a most serious character. To deny the Trinity was not only a theological heresy, it was an offence against the law. When the Essex-street congregation was first founded, it was greatly feared that legal measures would be employed to prevent its avowed Unitarian worship. For some time a Government official attended the services to make sure of the kind of worship which was conducted in the chapel. It was, then, a most serious matter for Lindsey to make himself liable to pains and penalties by attempting to propagate a doctrine which was regarded as a social danger and a legal offence.

With all his moral courage he was not a defiant fanatic, eager to rush into reckless martyrdom. He took advice with his friends; and, to his surprise, he discovered how many, in secret, had reached his own views, through a study of the scriptures. And he found that these clergymen had decided that it was possible for them to remain in a Trinitarian Church, holding a Unitarian Faith. For some time he pondered over the difficulties of his position, and sometimes tried to forget them by plunging into hard work—especially into work that sought the amelioration of the poor and the suffering. But every time he conducted public worship the question rose, with increasing force, "What right have I to use these words?" To profess with his lips what his heart denied, to employ forms of prayer that to him were idolatrous, this was becoming intolerable to a man who was unsophistically sincere, and who became more and more conscious of a burden of the Lord resting upon him to proclaim and propagate the Christian Faith for which he believed the Great Master lived and died.

His noble friend, the Duke of Northumberland, to whom he unbosomed himself, told him that it was a piece of folly to think of seceding on account of such trifling scruples. Even his Bishop begged of him to reconsider his resignation. And most influential of all was the suggestion of Dr. Priestley to remain in the Church and do his work as a reformer from within. It was suggested that he should modify the phraseology of the Prayer-book, and leave it to his ecclesiastical authorities to attack him for his conduct. But afterwards Dr. Priestley expressed his admiration of Lindsey for refusing to adopt such a course.

Only one event made him delay his decision. A movement was set on foot about this time to promote a petition to Parliament that some relaxation might be afforded to clerical subscription. If such relief was granted Lindsey hoped he might find it possible to hold his living. He worked with eager enthusiasm to secure signatures to this petition, and 250 names were attached to it. It came before the House on Feb. 6th, 1772, and, after a memorable discussion, it was outvoted by 217 members, as against 71 in its favour. By this decision of the House of Commons the petition for relaxation of subscription could not even be entertained. This event decided Lindsey's action, and in November, 1773, he preached his last sermon to his sorrowing parishioners in Catterick Church.

Never, in word or deed, did he pose as a martyr. He counted it an honour to serve religious truth, and he never lamented the sacrifices which that service involved. I do not know that he was ever in actual want; but certainly the change from Catterick to London must have been most trying to himself and his noble wife. His wife was stepdaughter to Archdeacon Blackburne, of Richmond, and was connected with several noble families. When her husband decided to secede she was strongly advised to separate herself from him. But, with unwavering faithfulness, she encouraged him in his course, and gladly shared his martyrdom. Both their furniture and library had to be sold to provide funds to enable them to travel to London, and, as far as I can discover, they could not reckon on a larger income than £20 a year. We are sure they must have felt the pinch of poverty, for we are told that their first lodgings in London consisted of two rooms and a cupboard. But they were quite peaceful and contented, and it was in these humble circumstances that Lindsey undertook the enterprise which has immortalised him amongst the leaders of religious thought. There can be no doubt that his easiest course would have been to accept the pastorate of one of the Presbyterian churches, which were then passing through their evolution from Orthodoxy and Arianism into avowed Unitarianism, though I imagine that very few of these congregations would have been prepared for such a robust form of Unitarianism as that which Lindsey had adopted. Yet it would have been a simple course to have sought the ministry of one of these churches.

But he was not the man to take any path because it happened to be the easiest. And it was clear to him that his duty lay in the direction of establishing a Unitarian Church adapted to the religious needs of those members of the Church of England who had renounced the Trinitarian dogma. I need not remind you of the early history of Essex-street Chapel, a history which is recalled to us every time we visit the Unitarian Association in Essex Hall, or join in worship within the walls of the noble church at Notting-hill.

We have a bright example of fidelity and undaunted zeal in the narrative which records how, in his squalid lodgings in Featherstone-court, Lindsey commenced the great work of his life. First in an auction room, and afterwards in his chapel, he founded a congregation whose worship was based upon faith in the Personal Unity of God, the One Father of Mankind. As far as was consistent with this supreme truth, he conformed his Revised Prayer-book to the ritual of the Church of England; it was intensely Christian in its sentiments, and no change was made in the language to startle or offend those who believed in a supernatural revelation and regarded scripture as an authoritative expression of the Divine Will. But, in the new editions of the Revised Liturgy it is most interesting to note the gradual development of Lindsey's theology; and, at last, with the omission of the Apostles' Creed, he identified himself with that career of Unitarian thought which has completely broken with the established symbols of what is called Evangelical Orthodoxy. At every stage of this mental development the only question with Lindsey was this: What is truth? And when he believed he had discovered truth, there was never any question of compromise; an instant and unquestioning obedience was yielded to the sternest demands of conscience. This man was always obedient to the Heavenly Vision; when the Divine Voice called, his only response was this: "Lord of truth, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

It was a providential blessing that in the career of our English Unitarianism there arose this brave, urgent apostle of the Unity of God. Two hundred clergyman signed the petition for relaxation of subscription. What became of the rest I know not, but we are profoundly thankful that at least one of them proclaimed himself openly as a Unitarian. I know that some of us desire that our churches should be unidentified by even the suspicion of a theological alliance, and I am not going to deal with that question this evening. And there is no need to deal with it. For, by whatever name our spiritual fellowship is identified, certainly it is as Unitarians that we have undertaken this pilgrimage to do honour to a man who gloried in the name of Unitarian as expressing both his private faith and the public worship of the Church he served. For myself, I may be allowed to say, I never hesitate, not only to call myself a Unitarian minister, but also to call the congregation I serve a Unitarian Church. That Unitarianism which Lindsey advocated needs our services and sacrifices still to-day. The Association that finds its home in Essex Hall exists for the purpose of propagating the monotheism of Jesus Christ; and our Missionary Societies, without an exception, devote their energies to the maintenance of that pure Christianity to which Lindsey consecrated his life. And this distinctly theological propaganda is still needed. We need twentieth-century confessors, with the absolute fidelity of Theophilus Lindsey. You, sometimes, boast of the large number of Rationalists, who linger within the borders of established and popular churches; you tell me that, in our obscurity and feebleness, we ought to comfort ourselves by the thought of those who think with us, but are not avowedly of us. I refuse to boast of these things; I refuse to find comfort from such considerations. Even if Trinitarianism be true, these men, who deny its truth, have no right to use its formulas.

If Lindsey had continued to use a theological formula against which his mind revolted, England would have been left without his splendid example—we should have been poorer by the loss of his noble protest, and he himself would have suffered most of all. No Bishop's mitre could ever have compensated for that halo of glorious martyrdom that now for ever shines upon the brow of our Great Confessor to the Unity of God. Had he made the "great Refusal," had he failed in that crisis of his life, he would have gone down into the limbo of those ineffective, frustrate ghosts, concerning whom it was said, in the words of Dante's mighty scorn:—Non ragionam di lor, ma guarda, e passa ("Talk not of them, give one look, and then pass onwards.")

We glory in the heretics of the Past, who have added to the High Tradition of the Race. But heretics devoid of moral courage—heretics who use solemn words which their minds disown, who drop their pinches of incense on a strange altar, who allow the issue of their lives to be decided by the chances of success, the threats of foes, the pleadings of friends—these are not the servants that religion needs to-day. Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis, Tempus eget ("The time requires other aid and other defenders than such as these.") Lindsey's career is an object-lesson in the Ethics of Subscription. The controversy concerning the ethics of subscription is not ended; the battle has yet to be fought; and this twentieth century may, perchance, witness very different results from those of the forlorn hope led by Lindsey in the eighteenth century. What we want is not only a reform in theology—we need, above all, a quickening of conscience in matters of theological profession.

In spite of cowardly retreat and miserable compromise, and shuffling exegesis, we still hope that a company of noble witnesses will rise, who will do and dare all things for the sake of pure and undefiled religion, and whose names, like that of the brave Confessor of Catterick, will be enshrined in the Calendar of human faith, when weak and timorous souls, who shrank from the solemn call of truth, have passed from memory for ever.

"Fragrant as Sharon's Rose," are the words of my sentiment; they remind me of the lines:—

Sweet Rose! in air whose odours wave,
And colour charms the eye;
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou, alas! must die.

Sweet Spring! of days and roses made,
Whose charms for beauty vie;
Thy days depart, thy roses fade,
Thou too, alas! must die.

Only a sweet and holy soul
Hath tints that never fly:
While flowers decay, and seasons roll,
It lives, and cannot die.

At the conclusion of his address Mr. Walters repeated the words of the commemorative sentiment with which he began, and it was acknowledged by the whole audience standing in reverent silence.

THE CATTERICK PILGRIMAGE.

ON Saturday, July 13, a Pilgrimage was made to Catterick, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, promoted by the Teesside Committee of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, as a New Century commemoration of Theophilus Lindsey, who was for ten years vicar of Catterick, until in November, 1773, he resigned his living, because as a Unitarian he could no longer profess the doctrines of the Church or use its liturgy.

The suggestion of the Pilgrimage came from Mr. James Mawson, Chairman of the Teesside Committee, prompted by the report in the Christian Reformer of 1849 of a similar commemoration held in the August of that year, and the project was very successfully carried out under the pleasantest conditions on a glorious summer day.

The programme of the former commemoration, of which a report will be found also in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 8, 1849, was closely followed. A considerable number of the pilgrims met first at Richmond, and, after visiting the Castle, walked or drove, by Easby Abbey, the five miles to Catterick. There the whole company, numbering seventy-five in all, gathered early in the afternoon at the church, where they were met and most cordially received by the Rev. J. H. Evans, the present vicar of Catterick. After an inspection of the fine old church, Mr. Evans invited the company into the adjoining vicarage, from which the Lindseys went forth in December, 1773, not knowing what the future had in store for them. The house has no doubt been enlarged since those days, but it is substantially the same building, standing in a pleasant garden, and, with the church, occupying an eminence in the midst of the village. In the garden a photograph of the company was taken, with the vicar as centre of the group, and the Rev. Frank Walters and the representative of the B. and F.U.A. on either hand; and he then showed his visitors the study and dining-room of the vicarage, sacred to them from the memory of the Lindseys' Sunday evening classes, held there for the young people of the village, in addition to the vicar's large Sunday afternoon class held in the church, and also as the chief scene of that inward conflict, which issued in his brave confession and sacrifice for the sake of truth. Mr. Evans also most kindly brought out from a massive oak chest in the vestry the church registers of the latter part of the eighteenth century, showing in the marriage register the repeated signatures of Jeremiah Harrison (the father of Mrs. Cappe), and then from 1763 to 1773 the signatures of Theophilus Lindsey, in his clear firm hand. In the register of baptisms there is in 1763 a record of Lindsey's entrance upon his charge, and after the record of the baptisms of the following ten years, at the foot of a page this entry, in another hand :—

The Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, vicar of this place for ten years, voluntarily resigned, not from infirmities of age, but out of a principle of conscience, Nov. 28, 1773. A Christian devout, learned and ingenuous and a great benefactor of this place. He was succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Chaytor.

After this pleasant visit to the church and vicarage, tea was served in the Booth Memorial Hall, which was erected last year on the high road opposite the schools, in memory of a late resident and benefactor of the village.

THE COMMEMORATIVE MEETING.

After tea a meeting was held in the hall, under the presidency of Miss Clara C. Lucas, when among those present were the Revs. Frank Walters, V. D. Davis (representing the B. and F.U.A), Arthur Harvie, and W. H. Lambelle, Mrs. G. Cooper (Newcastle), who took part also in the pilgrimage of 1849, the Misses Fallows (Middlesbro'), Mr. J. Mawson, chairman, and Mr. T. F. Ward, treasurer, of the Teesside Committee, Messrs. F. C. Slater, E. H. Coysh, and J. D. Donald, officers of the N. and D.U.C. Association, Mr. W. J. Watson, Town Clerk of Thornaby, Councillor Green, of Stockton, Mr. and Mrs. E. Cox Walker (Darlington), Mr. J. Marshall, Editor of the Northern Echo, and Mr. L. Worstenholm (secretary). The vicar was also present in the body of the hall, declining a seat on the platform, as he was obliged to leave before the end of the meeting.

Among those who had sent letters regretting their inability to be present were the Revs. C. H. Wellbeloved, C. Hargrove, A. Gordon, and H. Rawlings, Dr. W. Blake Odgers (President of the B. and F.U.A.), Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough, and Dr. Courtney Kenny, of Cambridge.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who as minister of Essex Church, Kensington, now representing Lindsey's Essex-street Chapel, had been specially invited to be present and to respond to the sentiment of commemoration, sent a four-page illustrated souvenir for distribution, containing portraits of Lindsey, Mr. and Mrs. Newcome Cappe, and William Turner, and pictures of the exterior and interior of Essex Church, and also the following letter :—

Dear Mr. Mawson,—

Will you kindly explain to the Catterick Meeting my very real regret that I cannot be present. It would have been both an honour and a pleasure to respond, at your desire, to the fragrant memory of Theophilus Lindsey, but unfortunately and unavoidably I am unable to get away. With the chief events of Lindsey's career all the pilgrims, perhaps, will be familiar. But what have been the results of his conscientious sacrifice? If he could, for instance, return to London in this year 1901, and look for the fruits of his labours, would he see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied, or would he be disappointed!

He would see his old Essex-street Chapel turned into a useful hall, and be amazed at the numbers of new books there exhibited for sale, and be cheered by the crowded gatherings of the International Council.

He would see again, if he wandered through Kensington, a modern, red-brick, spire topped building, with a large memorial stone built into the front for all to con, and on that stone he would read his own name. And if he entered this church, erected by his trustees, he would find his own library books lining the walls of two large vestries, and he would thus know that his widow Hannah had carried out his desire by bequeathing them for the use of the resident minister. Moreover, amongst these age-worn tomes he would find seven precious volumes containing his own manuscript sermons and prayers, and while feeling proud of the clearly written lines, easily legible still to twentieth century readers, would yet be willing to admit, perhaps, the length and dryness of eighteenth-century discourses!

And then if he came out into the little church plot, which is shown in the souvenirs which I have sent, he would look up to a red granite monument, surmounted by a white marble boy who, seated firmly with book on knee, listens there for ever to an imaginary Sunday-school teacher, to whom he gives no trouble whatever. And as he watches the constant passers peer through the railings at the inscription on its face, his eyes fill with grateful tears as he reads, "Erected to the memory of the founders of Sunday-schools from Cardinal Borromeo to Theophilus Lindsey and Robert Raikes," for he thinks of his Sunday class of 100 boys in Catterick Church, and of good Catharine Cappe who followed out his work, and of the great results with which God awards small beginnings.

All these things would indeed gladden him, and prove that his sacrifice had not been in vain, nor his name forgotten.

On the other hand, he would be not a little disappointed if he inquired how many others have since come out of the house of bondage, and what changes or options have been introduced into the Prayer-book, creeds and articles. The secession from the Church of Dr. Jebb and a few others followed Lindsey's exodus during the next ten years, and to this extent at least his example was not in vain. But it was not followed as might have been anticipated from the signatures, numbering 197, to the famous Feathers Tavern Petition. To-day Mr. Stopford Brooke is the one notable exception.

Nor did Lindsey's hope and plan of a Reformed Church of England meet with the support that he quite expected. He had to abandon this idea, and admit its failure, and we still, after 130 years, seem as far from it as ever. But we must not abate one jot our own faith in the future, or our plea for "the open door." In the meantime let us practice the text of Lindsey's first Essex-street sermon—a sermon deserving all attention, partly because of its historic occasion, and chiefly because of its indication of his aim: "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." We care for no theology which does not promote personal piety; we look for no unity based on opinion, but on religion only.

I send heartiest greetings to all Lindsey lovers, and my best wishes for the success of this second historic pilgrimage.—Faithfully yours, FRANK K. FREESTON.

Essex House, Campden-hill,
London, W., July 12.

The meeting opened with the singing of Doddridge's hymn,

> O God of ages, by whose hand and prayer by the Rev. V. D. Davis.
> Thy people still are fed;

Miss LUCAS, on behalf of the Teesside Union of Churches, then offered a hearty welcome to the friends who had gathered for that pilgrimage. She referred to the historical associations of Catterick, which went back to the first preaching of Christianity by Paulinus in the north, when he was said to have baptised 3,000 of the people in the river Swale, close by. For themselves that was hallowed ground on account of the brave Confessor, whom they were met especially to commemorate—a man beloved by his parishioners, revered by his friends, a scholar in the church which he devoutly loved and in which he intended to spend his days. But there came those conscientious scruples which many another stifled, but which compelled Lindsey to go out, like Abraham of old, not knowing whither he went. They in those happier days could scarcely imagine the cost at which Lindsey and his brave wife made their sacrifices, but they remembered and honoured him, not merely for the special doctrines he taught, but above all for his testimony to truth, for the life he lived and the sacrifices he made. Miss Lucas read some interesting passages from the memoir of Mrs. Cappe, who was the most intimate friend of the Lindseys at the time of their leaving Catterick, and concluded by calling upon the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, the successor of William Turner and George Harris, who had been the chief speakers at the commemoration in 1849.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS then gave the memorial address, which is printed in full in our present issue. The sentiment he proposed, as it was moved by the Rev. George Harris in 1849:

To the memory of Theophilus Lindsey, fragrant as Sharon's rose. The remembrance of his sacrifice for Christian truth is sweet even in death.

The audience accepted it, standing in reverent silence.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS, who was called upon to respond, said they would all feel that the true response to those memorial words, after Mr. Walters's eloquent address, must be in silence and in their own hearts, in gratitude for such memories, and in the earnest prayer that they might all share in the same spirit, and in that loyalty to truth, which they saw in the old vicar of Catterick. Yet looking back to the former pilgrimage in 1849 it was natural that they should have asked someone to respond, and he wished some minister could have been present more worthy to fill the place formerly occupied by the venerable William Turner. But he was thankful to be allowed to take some part in that commemoration, and was glad to be there as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which was pledged to the maintenance of that simple form of Christianity to which Lindsey was so loyally devoted, and did its work in the broad and catholic spirit expressed in his first sermon in Essex-street, based upon the prayer that they might "keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." If they would forgive a personal reference he might perhaps claim a certain fitness in his occupying that place, since both at the time of the former pilgrimage and at the time of Lindsey's brave confession, members of his family, in earlier generations, had been connected with that body of English Dissenters who in the freedom of their religious life had reached the same position to which Lindsey came at such cost, and by whom he was welcomed when he left the Church. Mr. Davis concluded by once more emphasising the lessons of Lindsey's life, the example of his fearless integrity, his confession of Unitarian Christianity both by his teaching and by his life.

Mrs. COOPER, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, added some reminiscences of the pilgrimage of fifty-two years ago, in which she had taken part, after which a resolution of thanks to Mr. Walters for his address, to the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and to Miss Lucas for presiding, moved by Mr. COX WALKER, and seconded by Mr. W. J. WATSON, was unanimously passed. Cordial votes of thanks to the Vicar of Catterick, and to the secretaries who had so ably organised the proceedings were also passed, and the benediction, pronounced by Mr. Davis, brought the meeting to a close.

From Catterick Bridge Station those of the party who had not come upon their own wheels returned to Darlington, in carriages reserved for "Unitarian Pilgrims," and thence dispersed by their several routes for home.

UP THE RIVER.*

BY THE REV. H. S. PERRIS, M.A.

"There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God."—Psalm xlvi. 4.

FOR twelve hours we were removed from the smoky, crowded and seething metropolis, with its fretful life, to the quiet companionship of the woods, the meadows, and the water. The contrast was a very striking one, from hurry to rest, from noise to silence, from the heated pavements and dusty streets of London to the cool shade, and green leaves, and quiet waterway. The world with its busy life seemed farther removed than fifty miles; and none of us, be sure, felt sorry that we had left it for a time, with its getting and spending, its pleasures and sorrows, its problems and its strifes.

And yet we could feel no unkind thoughts of the old world, although, like Orlando with the melancholy Jaques in the forest, one might "desire we should be better strangers" for a time. How could we, when the flying express (hated of Ruskin) had taken us down, smoothly and swiftly, from Paddington to Taplow, and then the mysterious electricity had, for the rest of the day, driven our boat over the waters without noise or smell, or smoke, or fuss? Modern science helped us to enjoy our day's banquet with Nature; and so we flung no stones at her, and harboured no ungrateful thoughts.

The Thames, with its history of, at most, 2,000 years, cannot rival some of the other great rivers of the world for ancient and enduring fame. Think of the scenes and civilisations which have been witnessed by the Nile, with its Sphinx and Pyramids, its monuments of Pharaohs, Greeks, Romans, Saracens and Turks; by the Ganges, with its eleven tributaries as large as the Thames, flowing through the sacred land of the Buddhists; by the Euphrates, with the ruins of mighty Babylon upon its shores; by the Jordan, where Jesus came to accept the baptism of John; by the yellow Tiber whose story can only be expressed by uttering the magic name of Rome; by the Rhine, for the possession of which rivers of human blood have been shed! What records of the past their banks contain; what stories of old time their waters have told to the grey ocean!

In universal interest, in the place it holds in art, history, poetry, or legend, the Thames can compare with few of these famous streams. Its course is shorter, and its history less prolonged and varied. It takes its rise in no gigantic Alps or Himalayas; no lofty crags or vine-covered mountains look down upon its waves. No pilgrim throng comes to bathe in its waters; it has not yet been canonised or beatified. Apart from London, the population upon its banks is a small one. It flows through homely country scenery, along quiet valleys and through smooth meads; its course broken by no great falls, and with no "purple patches" of massive grandeur suitable for the pen of a Byron.

Yet I venture to think that for national interest, for practical utility, and for quiet and peaceful beauty, it is excelled by few of the great rivers of the world.

Its valley has been the prize of several of the successive races who conquered this country and settled here. The Romans were probably the first to build the little town of London, on a piece of rising ground east of Blackfriars and the Fleet River, and hemmed in by the Thames and its widespread marshes. The great military conquerors have left plentiful remains, walls and pavements and coins and graves and inscriptions, from Cirencester, near the source, to London, near the mouth. Then came the English, and the East and West Saxons, who overthrew the British in the sixth century and drove them into their western fastnesses. And then the Normans, whose leader was crowned in London on Christmas Day, and measured out the land in his Domesday Survey, and built the Tower and Windsor Castle. And so England became one, and London was its centre, and the Thames was the waterway for the ships going to and from the continent. And with the growth of London into the mightiest city of the world, the fame of the Thames has also grown. Its waters have borne the mightiest fleets of merchant ships. The world takes its time from Greenwich, and looks with reverence upon the Palace at Westminster as the mother of Parliaments. At Windsor is the great Castle where kings and queens have for centuries lived; at Eton, the famous School, and at Oxford the pile of beautiful and ancient Colleges, where the boyhood and youth of England have for long been reared. Oxford, Windsor, Runnymede, Westminster, London—what memories the names call up, what pictures of learning and piety; of the makers of laws and charters; of buried heroes, and poets, and statesmen and saints; of wealth and merchant princes, of world-embracing power!

And the river has a beauty and nobility of its own, even where the handiwork and the encroachments of man are most visible. The lower reaches of the Thames, with their wharves and barges and crowded shipping, have afforded countless subjects for the artist's pencil and brush. And even among the bridges of London such a majesty is lent to the moving stream by the mighty world of human life upon its shores, as to have inspired one of the most beautiful sonnets of Wordsworth himself. Writing upon Westminster Bridge in 1803 he sings:—

Earth has not anything to show more fair:
Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
A sight so touching in its majesty;
This city now doth like a garment wear
The beauty of the morning; silent, bare,
Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie
Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
Never did sun more beautifully steep
In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill;
Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
The river glideth of his own sweet will:
Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
And all that mighty heart is lying still!

The Thames is not without its literary associations. Various portions of the river have memories of Pope and Gay, of Dickens, Newman, and Cowley. James Thomson, in his "Seasons," has sung of its silver waters and its "matchless vale":—

* From a Sermon preached at Little Portland-street Chapel, London.

Enchanting vale! beyond whate'er the Muse
Has of Achaia or Hesperia sung!
O vale of bliss! O softly swelling hills!
On which the Power of Cultivation lies,
And joys to see the wonders of his toil.

And Shelley wrote some of his poems whilst in a boat on its bosom.

What thoughts, however, does the river bring to us, apart from its memories of great men and the pageantry of history?

1. It pictures to us the Silent and Never-Resting Munificence of God. Summer and winter, day and night, it glides along, from its source down to the sea; giving of its abundance from its quenchless springs; giving drink alike to man and beast and flower; not waiting for thanks, but passing eager on its errand of benevolence. The thirsty roots and flowers refresh themselves from it, after the hot glare of the summer sun. The fish make their haunts in its depths, and the blue kingfisher darts along its shady reaches; the swan with its downy brood sales over its surface like a stately ship followed by little barques. The woods and meadows on its sides are clothed with a delightful green, restful alike to the eye and heart. It suffers evil treatment, is stained and poisoned and polluted. But it stays not to complain, and renders good for evil; telling none of the guilty voices it has heard or the guilty deeds it has witnessed; bearing the impurities away into the great ocean of forgiveness and pity, and refreshing every channel with pure water from its eternal spring. So does the munificence of God sweep through the world, bearing joy and hope and love with it. Never resting in His self-imposed task, He offers to all the children of men the pure waters of life, gives them health and beauty and joy, the means of labour and the opportunities of gaining heavenly riches. He makes no distinction between the rich and poor, or small or great. Even to the sinful He grants a merciful discharge and healing of their guilt. His providence guides men over the shallows and steers them through the deep, until at last they are gathered into the great sea of His all-cleansing love.

2. The River reminds us of the Stream of Faith. Matthew Arnold, as he listened to the sound of the retreating waves on Dover Beach, thought of dying creeds and forgotten hopes, and the vanity of our "little systems."

The Sea of Faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore
Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd,
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating, to the breath
Of the night-wind, down the vast edges drear
And naked shingles of the world.

But the river brings us no such sad and dreary message as this; at least, if we share in John Stuart Blackie's robuster mood, and hear it joining in the great chorus of created things.

Praise ye, praise ye, God the Lord!

The River of Faith, like the rolling stream, has its shallows; but it also has its deeps. It receives many a tributary stream, until the original water seems to be overwhelmed and lost. But the general effect is of broadening and deepening, and is, we trust, for good. And though oft marred and stained, the impulse from God remains, though we see it not. And the widening makes it more useful for human ends, and enables great multitudes of various men to float on its waters. And even though, in the end, it should flow into the great sea of Universal Faith, is its work lost, or its value lessened? Let us, at any rate, commit ourselves to it in hope and trust. God rules and guides; His purposes are vaster than our minds can reach; but of this we may be sure, that the stream will flow on and on, and His care for us is so great that we may safely trust ourselves and our faith wherever His Spirit shall lead.

3. A day up the river tends to make us echo Cowper's thought, that "God made the country, man the town," and with a sharp significance. We drink of the pleasant sights of the upper river; the peace of God overflows our spirits; the meadows, the birds, and the quiet waterway drive away the fretfulness and cares of the world, with its noise and greed, and littleness. But then the evening falls; and with the sunset behind us, we turn homewards; and the heavenly light sheds a new glory and a richer meaning upon the busy world to which we are speeding back. God made the town too, or at least He made the men and women who made the town! Up the river is rest and peace and refreshment; but down the river, in the great city, is the scene where God has placed our work, where our lives are being lived. May He refresh us all for our daily tasks, as He renews the waters which flow by the Great City's streets! May He give us more purity, and power to give help and healing; and put away the memory of our sins and failures and follies! For here are abundant tasks to do, and places to be filled. Is London one day to be numbered among the dead cities of the world? Will she be called as Rome was called by Byron, the "Niobe of nations weeping for her children?" What shall save her and make her endure, and make her indeed the Eternal City of God? Surely righteousness alone, and love and pity, and justice and fair dealing in her streets and markets, and humility amidst her wealth and power, and the life hid with God, amidst her greatness and magnificence! Not by numbers, not by gold, not by weapons of war shall she endure; else why have Nineveh and Babylon and Sparta become names and glories of the past?

Let knowledge and religion be her boast, rather; and let the River of the Water of Life, bright as crystal, proceeding from the throne of God, flow more and more abundantly through her streets and in the hearts of her myriad people. And then shall she bear in her midst the tree of life and the leaves of the tree shall be for the healing of the nations.

RAMSAY SERVICES.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to make a correction in Mr. Shanks' letter which appeared in your columns last week? Sunday morning service will be conducted in Quayle's Hall, Albert-street, and not in the Palace. Service will commence at eleven o'clock.

CHARLES ROPER.

THE WORKING-CLASSES AND THE CHURCH.

A SOMEWHAT remarkable gathering crowded the Free Christian Church, Croydon, last Sunday afternoon. The various bodies representative of labour in Croydon invited the minister of the church, Mr. J. Page Hopps, to meet a congregation of their constituents who wished to show their respect and to hear from him an address on some vitally useful subject. They preferred the Church; and the subject announced was, "What the Working-classes could make of England." The address was preceded by a short religious service, which was most devoutly joined in by all; but, after that, feelings were by no means kept in restraint; and the address elicited a response to which very few churches have echoed. It was evidently a congregation of well-doing, keen and alert men and women of the skilled working-class, startlingly sharp to catch and appreciate points however subtle, and as startlingly sharp to indicate that they did. The address was an outspoken setting-forth of the defects and hindrances to the progress, uplifting and usefulness of the working-classes, and a strong lead onward, through education and the independence it would give; through freedom from the entanglements of certain military, political, social, and financial forces which had too long captured and used them; through self-reliance and co-operation; and through gradually growing tastes of a higher and saner kind, accompanied by a better knowledge of public affairs and of their own rights, duties, and power in regard to them.

Referring to the sinister growth of the power of capital, and the rise of syndicates, trusts, and corners, Mr. Page Hopps said:—But at this point we can see what these signs of the times mean: and what they mean is this—that syndicates, trusts, and corners, ay! and sweaters, are natural products of modern needs. They are all attempts at necessary organisation and at economy. The vast transactions of the world require vast aggregations of wealth, and vast facilities for huge movements: hence the combinations or the organisations that at present seem unsocial and tyrannical. Now what is the lesson? The lesson surely is that instead of leaving these vast combinations to a few, they ought to be secured by and in the interests of the many. The Socialist, pure and simple, sees this, and he therefore holds that the State, that is the community, should do its own syndicating, so that the whole community, instead of the keen, rich, and resolute few, should profit by the new methods of combination and control. How far this could be is doubtful; but it is certain that we could go a long way in this direction with advantage; and it may safely be laid down as an axiom that the bias, the strong bias, of the community should always be in favour of State or Municipal control of combinations for production, distribution, and public conveniences of every kind, even including all the water ways and railways of the country: and for this the working-classes should stand together to a man.

With regard to England's conduct in foreign affairs, the speaker said the ideal for England in relation to other nations is that we should make it a land that the world might reverence and copy. That was our true heritage, but we have sold our birth-right for a mess of pottage—and, after all, the pottage only burns, and does not feed. Old England was slowly coming to the first place, not for its prowess but its probity; not because it could fight, but because it hated oppression, because it was humane, and because of its sympathy with the gallant little nations rightly struggling to be free. But we shall get back. We shall have a clean England some day, an England that will put conscience before greed, honour before advancement, generosity before smartness, and God before Mammon; and I firmly believe that the impetus will come very largely indeed from the factories, the fields, and the workshops of this dear old land. And a prosperous as well as an honest England it is going to be. I very much doubt the inevitableness of the decline of British trade and commerce. The world is not a sucked orange: we are, indeed, only beginning to get beneath its rind. All we want is a higher standard, combined with a brighter imagination, a keener desire for better things, and a sterner resolve to get them. We must acquire a taste for nice ideals, and a wholesome dislike for dirt, drink, and devilry; and in that direction find the true patriot. It is a wretched idea of a patriot that he is a man who is willing that his country should profit by wrong-doing, and who is prepared to back up its ruling class in anything it does. That is shameful, dishonourable, dangerous. He, on the contrary, is a true patriot who wants to see his country honoured and revered; the best beloved and trusted, not the richest and most feared.

The address concluded with an animated "prophecy that these better things shall be."

At an early stage of the proceedings it was intimated that a member of the Committee had received a large number of "love letters" concerning the gathering from such diverse spirits as the Bishop of Hereford, Mr. R. Bell, M.P., the Dean of Durham, the Right Hon. L. H. Courtney, M.A., the Rev. Silas Hocking, Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, Dr. John Clifford, Mr. Frederick Harrison, Mr. Edward Carpenter, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. Herbert Burrows, and several others.

HOLIDAYS FOR POOR CINDERELLAS.

SIR,—Will you be so good as to allow me to acknowledge through your columns the very generous response of your readers to my appeal. I have received altogether the sum of £16 16s. 6d. This is quite sufficient for my purpose. I have, as far as possible, acknowledged every subscription through the post, but I felt that it was due to your readers that I should state here the result of my appeal. I should also be glad to signify the safe arrival of their kind contributions to those friends who sent anonymously. Amongst these were A. W., 10s.; W. D., 10s.; Seaforth, 3s. 6d.; Fellowship, 2s. 6d.; Anon., 10s.; Lady Friend, 10s. The Cinderellas are going away in two companies; girls this week, boys next. I hope your readers will find in their own holidays something of the happiness which they have so generously helped to bring into the lives of these poor little waifs. CHARLES PEACH.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION, BELL-STREET.

SIR,—May I ask for space in your columns to set forth the needs of the Bell-street Mission Convalescent Fund? We have this year, in connection with our fund, opened a small cottage at Billingshurst, Sussex, in a charming country neighbourhood, under the efficient care of our minister there, the Rev. George Lansdowne. We are naturally anxious to keep it full during this particularly hot and trying summer. Unfortunately, owing to causes from which all charitable institutions are alike suffering this year, our subscription list has fallen considerably short, and unless it is augmented by new or increased subscriptions, we shall be forced for lack of funds to close the cottage at the end of August, thus leaving it empty all through September, one of the pleasantest holiday months. We feel sure your readers will enable us to avoid this. Subscriptions and donations will be received and acknowledged, in my absence from home, by the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, 25, Carlton Mansions, Portsdown-road, W.

SOPHY EVELEGH, Hon. Treasurer,
Bell-street Convalescent Fund.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Sunday School Treats.

This is the season when reports of the children's summer treats come pouring in. This week we have heard of successful excursions by the schools at Selby and Swansea, Pontypridd and George's-row Mission, London. Schools would be wise, we should say, in all parts of the country, to hold their treats during the present magnificent month, for if the experience of last year is to be repeated, August will be a somewhat chilly month of uncertain weather. But while we are glad to think that the children in all our schools enjoy their treats, they do not appear to us events necessary to be reported.

Boston.—The congregation of Spain-lane Chapel had the pleasure of a visit last Sunday from the Rev. James Eills, of the First Church, Boston, Mass., who preached at the evening service. There was a special interest in the visit, as Mr. Eills is the present minister of the church to which John Cotton was called, at the time of the exodus of the Pilgrim Fathers, after having been vicar of St. Botolph's from 1612 to 1633.

Cardiganshire: Ciliau Aeron and Rhydygwin.—Last Sunday the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, preached in the morning at Ciliau, and in the afternoon at Felinfach Board School, where the Rhydygwin congregation now assemble owing to their chapel being painted. He attended the latter place in his youth, and large congregations were thus drawn to hear him.

Darlington.—The services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, who, on the previous day, had taken part in the "Pilgrimage" to Catterick, in memory of Theophilus Lindsey, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. With reference to this commemoration, Mr. Davis took as the subject of his evening sermon "A Unitarian Confessor," and told the story of the vicar of Catterick's secession from the Church. He also referred to the very friendly welcome given to the pilgrims by the present vicar of Catterick, and drew from this a lesson as to the spirit in which their steadfast witness to religious truth should be borne.

Elland.—The anniversary services were conducted in Christ Church on Sunday, July 7, by the Rev. J. E. Manning, of Sheffield. The congregations were good, especially in the evening, when the chapel was quite full. The children sang their hymns very sweetly. The collections taken amounted to nearly £8.

Kingswood (near Birmingham).—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, July 14, the preacher being the Rev. John Birks, of Derby, a former minister of the chapel from 1866 to 1870. A number of the members of his old congregation were present at the services. Anthems were given by the choir, and special hymns sung by the scholars. As usual, buns were distributed to the scholars at the close of the morning service, there being now 100 scholars on the roll. The collections amounted to £11 8s. The services were very enjoyable, and congregations and collections very satisfactory.

London: George's-row Domestic Mission.—On Tuesday the annual flower show in connection with the Window Gardening Society was held, when between three and four hundred plants were exhibited. Through much sun the bloom was very plentiful. A fine collection of gift plants were again sent by Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, who allowed his head gardener to judge the plants, to the satisfaction of all. At the public meeting for the distribution of prizes, Mr. Enos Howes, J.P., Mayor of Finsbury, presided, and the Mayoress presented the prizes. An excellent address was delivered by Mr. A. Preston, J.P., and Miss Jevons and Miss Kennedy supplied music. A vote of thanks was moved by the Rev. F. Summers.

Mottram.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school had its annual procession through the village. A large company marched to the centre and halted while hymns were sung and an address delivered by the Rev. N. Green. Returning to the chapel a sermon was preached by Mr. Green to parents and teachers, and suitable hymns were sung by scholars and the congregation. In the evening a musical service was held, and prizes in books to the number of eighty-two were awarded to scholars for punctual and regular attendance during the year. The chapel was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, and large congregations assembled afternoon and evening to enjoy the services, which were interesting and instructive.

Newton Abbott.—After holding services for three years in the Public Rooms, the members of the Unitarian congregation, in the spirit of the new century meetings, have made a determined effort to go forward. They have purchased a building formerly used as a day-school, which is of ecclesiastical appearance both inside and out, and has been thoroughly cleaned and renovated and furnished up to date with every convenience. The purchase was due in the first instance to the generosity of Mr. William Dunn, a member of the congregation, who not only gave £50 towards the purchase, but obtained for the Committee the loan of £200 at a low rate of interest. Among other generous donors outside the congregation were the Right Hon. C. Searle Hayne, the member for the division; Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., late president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Mr. T. B. Bowring, and Mr. F. H. Plumptree, J.P., brother of the late Dean of Wells. The church was opened on Sunday evening, July 14, when a dedication service was conducted by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., of Bristol, and the building was filled to the utmost capacity by an earnest congregation. The opening services are to be continued on Sunday next, July 21, by the Rev. F. T. Reed, who was the founder of the movement at Newton Abbott, and on the 28th by the Rev. A. Lancaster, Mr. Reed's successor at Moreton-hampstead.

Pontypridd.—The Sunday-school anniversary was held on Sunday, July 14. The services were conducted by Mr. G. Leonard Phelps, of the Home Missionary College. In the afternoon recitations were given by the scholars, and Mr. Phelps gave an interesting address. The evening service was well attended. Mr. Phelps having accepted an invitation to take charge of the Pontypridd Church during the summer vacation, commenced his duties on Sunday, July 7. A Church Calendar has been prepared, setting forth our position, and 1,000 have been printed and circulated about the town and district, giving all a cordial invitation to the services.

Shrewsbury.—On June 30 the 111th anniversary of the High-street Sunday-school was commemorated. The services were conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. C. Street. Special hymns were sung by the scholars, and collections taken on behalf of the Sunday School Fund. The usual out-door gathering was held on July 11.

Taunton (Appointment).—The Rev. G. V. Crook, late of Adare, co. Limerick, Ireland, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of Mary-street Chapel, and commenced his duties on Sunday, 14th inst. Mr. Crook is a son of the late Rev. Dr. Crook, once President of the Wesleyan Conference, and has himself only just retired from the Wesleyan ministry.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE congregation of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, have arranged for the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, M.A., to preach on alternate Sundays from the middle of October to the end of March, 1902. The Special Services Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will endeavour to arrange for Mr. Brooke to preach at a few of the places in the country, where engagements had to be abandoned last year, owing to his illness. It will not be possible for the Committee to arrange any further series of services before the autumn of 1902.

IN consequence of the autumnal meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which will be held at Leeds on Monday, Oct. 21, and Tuesday, Oct. 22, the meeting of the Council, announced in the "Unitarian Pocket Almanac," will be postponed until Tuesday, Oct. 29. The meeting on this occasion will be held at 6 P.M., when the ordinary business will be transacted. Tea will then be provided at 7; and at 8 o'clock there will be a meeting in the large hall, the President, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., in the chair, when the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams will deliver an address on "Experiences and Work in India as the Representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association." We hope there will be a large attendance to welcome Mr. Williams home again after his arduous and deeply interesting mission in India.

SINCE the receipt of Mr. Armstrong's most welcome Iceland letter, which will be found in another column, we have had a further note from him, dated from Copenhagen last Sunday. He and his party arrived in time to join in the morning service with "Our Youngest Brother," for whom, we are glad to say, Mr. Armstrong's collection from friends in this country amounted to £35 11s. (which as Kr. 640 looks like a substantial token of sympathy). A meeting was to be held in Copenhagen on Wednesday evening for Mr. Armstrong and Anton Jensen, the young clergyman of Harboore, whose deprivation on account of heresy we recorded in THE INQUIRER of March 9. Mr. Jensen has since translated Mr. Armstrong's "Back to Jesus" into Danish.

THE community of Liberal Protestants in France, and particularly in Paris, have suffered a great loss in the death last week of M. Etienne Coquerel, a younger brother of the late Athanase Coquerel, and for many years the editor of Le Protestant. M. Coquerel, who was an honoured foreign correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was seventy-two years of age. He had been for some little time in failing health, but only a month ago attended some important meetings at Nîmes. He passed away quite peacefully in the night of July 15, faithful to the end, as his colleagues of the Protestant say, to the cause of truth and of the Gospel. The funeral service on Thursday week was conducted by the Rev. E. Fontanès.

ON Friday week the adjourned meeting of London Nonconformist Ministers at the Memorial Hall, after considerable discussion, adopted a manifesto embodying an earnest prayer for peace in South Africa, and proposals for a constructive policy to make for peace, based on the following lines :—

1. That there shall be nothing to retard or frustrate the future unity and amity of the peoples of South Africa.
2. That every security should be taken to prevent the recurrence of military strife.
3. That the invariable policy of the British Empire in the administration of its Colonies should be adopted in the settlement of South Africa—namely, the concession of autonomy and self-government; and that there be ultimately the Federation of the States.
4. That there should be compensation for destroyed homes and farms to all who are able to establish a just claim.
5. And that there should be an amnesty as generous and far-reaching as possible, on condition of the immediate laying down of arms and breaking up of all military organisation.

These proposals are followed by expressing of earnest sympathy with brother Ministers, both of Dutch and of English race.

THE Government on Wednesday forced their Education Bill through the Committee stage, unamended, in spite of the strong pleas not only of the Opposition, but of distinguished friends of education among their own followers. What the effect of this temporary measure may be, time only can show, but it seems to promise a good deal of confusion and hindrance of admirable work. Both the Bill and the Evening School Minute were vigorously denounced at a great meeting of Free Churchmen at the Memorial Hall on Thursday week, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie seconded Dr. Clifford's resolution on the Minute, protesting against the crippling of Board Schools and the favour shown to sectarian and private evening schools, and the Rev. H. E. Dowson was also among the speakers.

THE Wesleyan Conference has been holding its annual meeting in Newcastle-on-Tyne this week. On Tuesday afternoon the new President, the Rev. W. T. Davison, D.D., Professor of Theology in the Handsworth College, delivered his address, which was an earnest, eloquent, and most wholesome appeal for more genuine religious life. Asking what the position of Methodism must be at the opening of the new century in face of the strong current of worldliness which was pressing so hard on the present generation, he warned his hearers that self-confidence and subtle unbelief were the greatest foes to religion, but then wisely distinguished between an evil worldliness and a reverent and thankful acceptance of the good gifts of life. It was an age of amusements and increasing expenditure and love of excitement, fatal to the old simplicity of life, yet these must be met not by railing but by showing to the people more beautiful gifts and a purer joy in life.

We do not understand that Monasticism is the ideal of life or asceticism synonymous with virtue. We have to teach our young people that the "earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, the world and them that dwell therein"; we have to show them the excellence of the religion that claims life with all its beauty and gracious abundance, and all the rapture of growing knowledge, and of the use of developing power, and all the charms of society, all the fascination of earthly enjoyments—and claims all these for the God Who made both us and them.

It is the duty of the Church not to scorn or despise the life that now is, but to win and consecrate it all. In the school of life we have to prove the power of spiritual things, and the Church that is truly spiritual, showing that it cares above all for the unseen spiritual realities of life, will alone be able to do its appointed work. Warning his hearers against too much reliance on organisation and outward church extension, the President said :—

Danger from worldliness is not met by the multiplication of special services; spasmodic excitement does not spell health, but febrile weakness. I plead for a steady maintenance of a high, sober, practical, spiritual life that by its own intrinsic excellence and beauty shall approve itself to the world and gather the best that is in the world round about it. It is to be of a distinctly Methodist type, not because we are better than our neighbours, but because God has given to us from the beginning a certain delightful, earnest, warm-hearted, contagious influence, and one that is most specially pleasing to the people. The tone of the life will be evangelical, but with no narrowness and lack of virility with which evangelicals have been charged. The life, broad, not lax, attractive, not easy-going, earnest, not fanatical—it will be marked continuously by its efforts after righteousness, which will not be made in a spirit of cliquism, sectarianism, and partisanship, but in the spirit of our Lord and Master, Who said: "I am not come to condemn the world, but that the world through Me might be saved."

On Wednesday morning Mr. R. W. Perks moved the adoption of the report of the Twentieth Century Fund, which showed £646,107 already banked, of which over £15,000 had been received in interest, and reliable promises amounting to £900,000. The Fund is to be closed at the end of the year, and an urgent appeal was made for the final £100,000 required to make up the million aimed at.

Professor Jean Réville, of Paris, whose welcome presence at the International Council meetings in Whit-week will be remembered by our readers, has recently published a valuable study of the Fourth Gospel, "Le Quatrième Evangile, son Origine et sa Valeur historique" (Paris: Leroux. 6s. 6d.). The book is included as the fourteenth volume in the "Bibliothèque de l'Ecole des Hautes Etudes," published under the auspices of the Minister of Public Instruction, a series which includes also M. Réville's "Les Origines de l'Episcopat," a study of the development of ecclesiastical government in the Christian Church in the Roman Empire. Of this new book the Athenæum, in a review last week, speaks as "destined to have a great influence," and refers to its author in the following terms :—

M. Jean Réville has peculiar qualifications for dealing with the problem of the Fourth Gospel. He has applied himself with great success to the study of comparative religion, and is one of the editors of the admirable "Revue de l'Histoire des Religions." He has worked at the history of the Church under the Empire, and has published works on the origin of the Episcopate, and on religion at Rome under the Severi. He also made, a quarter of a century ago, a special study of Philo, and of the doctrine of the Logos in the Fourth Gospel and in that writer. It has also to be said that he comes to his present task with the necessary freedom from theological bias, and with full disposition, and also much ability, to see facts as they are. That a scholar so equipped should have written a book on the Fourth Gospel is a fact likely to prove of importance for theology. The result is a more thorough and scientific disproof than any that has yet been given to the world of the Johannine authorship of the Gospel, but, at the same time, a more satisfactory exposition than has yet been seen of the Gospel as a statement of Christian doctrine in the terms of the philosophy prevailing in its age.

M. Réville's work is divided into four parts, the third of which, occupying more than half of the volume of 344 pages, consists of a critical analysis of the Gospel, together with a succinct Commentary. The first two parts treat of the Johannine Tradition and the Prologue, the concluding part of "The Evangelist." M. Réville's conclusions are very definite. The Gospel, in his judgment, is the work of an unknown mystic in the early part of the second century, who separated the spiritual gospel of Jesus from the Jewish realism and the Messianic imagery of its earlier form, adapting it to the modes of Greek thought in which he had been trained. The Gospel is not to be regarded as an historical work; one must not seek in it for the facts of the life of Jesus any more than one can reconstruct the life of Moses from the writings of Philo. "The Fourth Evangelist was the Plato of his Socrates, not the Xenophon." Thus it is impossible that John the Apostle could be the author of the Gospel. Yet, as a work of spiritual imagination, it is of supreme worth—a monument of the Christian piety of its age.

In the July number of the Seed Sower, the Rev. L. P. Jacks writes in criticism of Dr. Warschauer's articles on "Christianity, the Religion of the Incarnation," which, since their appearance in these columns, have been reprinted in pamphlet form. The constructive efforts of Liberal Theology are, in Mr. Jacks' view, to be cordially welcomed, even if the immediate results are not destined to be very permanent. The present activity, he says, is mainly devoted to the elaboration of new Christologies.

A new scholastic seems to be in preparation, not less various in its forms—and we would add, not less unstable in its results—than that which came to a head in the Nicene Creed. One agreement, however, pervades these new attempts, and that is a large and notable concession to the Agnostics, expressed in the proposition that apart from Christ God is unknowable. By some this unknowableness is made absolute, by Dr. Warschauer it is considered only as the difficulty of the average man.

Dealing with the plea that while a few exceptional men may have direct vision of God, to most men that is unattainable, and they must look rather to the revelation of God in Christ, since in him we see "the Divine Nature manifested on the finite scale," Mr. Jacks contends that to speak of the Infinite as manifested on the finite scale is a flat contradiction in terms and "only lends added obscurity to the puzzle it is intended to solve." And his dissent from Dr. Warschauer's plea he finds to start "from a radically different conception—from an opposite conception—of what the vision of God means."

To our thinking the vision of God does not consist in seeing the infinite reduced to the finite scale, but in seeing the finite expanded to an infinite significance. The former of these conceptions is represented in history by the theory of the one God-man, to which the Liberal Movement is essentially opposed. The religious education of the world consists in learning to see all things in their eternal relationships; for which end it is necessary to withdraw the eye of the soul from its concentration on the one divine object and learn the infinite connections of all objects and all thoughts. We have always understood that a chief aim of the Liberal Movement was in this direction, but we are bound to confess that the Christology of Dr. Warschauer impresses us as having the opposite tendency. Dr. Warschauer assures us that the infinitude of God renders Him incomprehensible to us. We, on the other hand, believe that the knowledge of God consists in the meeting of the infinite in Him with the infinite in us, insomuch that all further faith in God, and all more detailed ideas of His attributes rest on our vision of His infinitude. We, therefore, hold that all attempts to make God comprehensible by contemplating a finite object are bound to fail.

And then Mr. Jacks asks a question which we had fully expected some correspondent to ask in these columns when Dr. Warschauer's articles first appeared.

Seeing that, according to Dr. Warschauer, exceptional men may "know God," is it so vain a thing to plead with men to raise themselves to the now exceptional level: and is it not wiser to place one's hope for the future of faith in the attainment of soul-levels which are only exceptional so long as we are content with a lower average, than to make accommodations with the present defects of human nature?

The true function of Christian discipleship, as we understand it, is to waken the better manhood in those who are on the lower levels, and to lead all men up to higher levels, where they may have for themselves more and more perfect vision of the Father.

The first volume of the new and cheaper edition of the late John Hamilton Thom's "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ" is now ready, and may be had from Mr. Philip Green, at Essex Hall. The issue of this volume, well printed and bound, for half-a-crown, is a token of the high estimation in which these sermons are rightly held, and of the generous desire that their quickening influence should reach as wide a circle of readers as possible. The second volume will also be out in a few weeks, and we shall then claim the privilege of once more calling attention to the work of one of our greatest preachers.

We have received a letter from Mr. Richard Simon, of Nottingham, expressing surprise that no one else has protested against the recent meeting of the Lancashire and Cheshire Provincial Assembly, held in Manchester to consider a resolution on the war in South Africa, and reported in The Inquirer of July 6. The proceedings of the ministers and delegates, "apparently in an official capacity," Mr. Simon regards as objectionable, and he says: — "Taken as expressions of individual opinion, of course no one would object, although many might think the opinions themselves mistaken and their expressions ill-timed; but it is obviously undesirable that those appointed for specific purposes, should use their organisation for others." Mr. Simon is, perhaps, not aware that one of the duties of the Committee of the Assembly, annually appointed, is to present a report on public questions, and that the discussion of such questions, bearing upon the social and moral welfare of the people, and the passing of resolutions thereon, is a recognised part of the Assembly's proceedings.

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE DUTCH MENNONITE COMMUNITY FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AND BETTERMENT.

BY THE REV. F. C. FLEISCHER.*

IN undertaking to speak of the importance of the Dutch Mennonites for religious liberty and betterment, I find I have a very difficult problem to solve. For I must try to compress a history of nearly four centuries into the brief space of time of not even four times five minutes! A truly arduous task! And yet it must be done. For if it be accepted as a fact that it is next to impossible to understand any community without full knowledge of its past, this is most decidedly the case with the Mennonite congregations. What they are, what they aim at, what they promise for the future—it all lies in their past.

I purpose to throw my searchlight upon this chapter of ecclesiastical history from two sides, so that the Dutch Mennonites may appear before you as a community of religious radicals, and as a community of free individual conviction.

A Community of Religious Radicals.

The great reformers—Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, Cranmer—were relatively staid men. With one hand they took what was new, and with the other they clung to what was old and established. Hence so many of the institutions, practices and dogmas of the Roman Catholic have been preserved in the so-called Protestant Churches.

But there were other friends of the new light who could not allow Protestant principles so to suffer and not to be acted up to consistently. They were perhaps the most independent, but also the least organised ones—tenacious, indomitable minds, but forsaken by the majority in days of persecution.

Among these radicals there were some who were anxious to reform, nay to renew the Christian life—the Baptizers;† and others who wished to reform radically the Christian dogmatics—the Antitrinitarians. Both these radical factions aimed at the Apostolic principle of purification. Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are past away; behold, all things are become new.—2 Cor. v. 17.

In the long run those two currents were sure to meet. And so it happened, and as a living proof hereof I, a twentieth-century Baptizer, am amongst you twentieth-century Antitrinitarians.

These religious radicals did not originally stand on any other foundation than the so-called great—i.e. successful—Reformers. Luther himself hesitated long. So did Melanchthon. At first the Baptizers confidentially approached the Evangelicals, until the latter, led by considerations of prevailing political wisdom, strongly opposed the radicalism of the former.

The Reformers as well as the Roman Catholic Hierarchy vindicated the error, that there is not only a general religious truth, but that this may also be fixed so clearly, so convincingly and so indisputably, that it can no longer be allowed to have an opinion of one's own. Those who ventured nevertheless to have such a particular opinion were liable to the death penalty. And where the Reformers had the legal sword in hand, they did not hesitate to use it against such intolerable sinners.

On Jan. 5, 1527, their first victim fell. This was Felix Manz, a young and learned man of a distinguished family in Zürich, who had committed the crime of controverting in public Zwingli's theses on the true Christian Baptism and of disapproving of the cruel abominable war. Manz was drowned in the beautiful Lake of Zürich. Mergatur qui iterum mergit or Mergatur qui mergitur, Zwingli is asserted to have said.

This first victim of our community was followed by many hundreds in nearly every country, and this persecution drove a portion of the Baptizers to despair and caused the shameful insurrection at Münster, in Germany, near our Dutch frontiers, which was for the greater part owing to Dutch Baptizers.

The great majority of Baptizers, however, refused to engage in such troubles, and to the latter came, when the fulness of the time was come, "our principal leader," Menno Simons, after having been a vicar-priest at Pingjum for a period of about fifteen years and for four years as a parson at Witmarsum, at the time one of the most important congregations in Friesland (Jan. 12, 1536).

Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens and some other calm, staid, sound, pious workers organised the peaceable Baptizers, who, bereft of many of their original leaders, were "scattered abroad as sheep having no shepherd."

Inclined by nature to a quiet, patient fear of God, they were strengthened on this point by the natural reaction against the excesses of the people of Münster and the Batenburgers and by their fear of being mistaken for these turbulent and obstinate fanatics.

They applied their radicalism to their own lives, to get "the hidden man of the heart, that which is not corruptible, a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God a great prize." Candour in their individual and domestic lives, love of truth, brotherly love and readiness to help, great simplicity in divine service, were some of their striking marks. Their refusal of taking the oath is partly due to their respect for the trustiness of their spoken word, which should be yea, yea, and nay, nay, partly to their respect for the Lord's commandments. Likewise in consequence of the Evangelical precept imprinted on their souls, by their aversion to the Münster atrocities, they advocated absolute defencelessness. The Sermon on the Mount was to them the glorious stream of light in the Gospel, as in our days to the celebrated and venerable Count Leo Tolstoy and his followers; nay, in many respects, this Russian Evangelical movement may be regarded as a later form of the same religious radicalism which the sixteenth-century Mennonites defended. Each true Mennonite knew the Sermon on the Mount by heart, and likewise the Epistle of James, very dear to him on account of its practical contents.

A Community of Free Individual Conviction.

A radical consistent Protestantism, in our opinion, cannot be joined with a Confessional Church strictly so called. Hence Menno Simons and his brethren wished for something else than Luther, Calvin, Zwingli, or Cranmer. These men wished a Church; Menno wished a congregation of Christ.

In a congregation no one can be called master, "for one is your master, even Christ, but he that is greatest among you shall be your servant." Properly speaking we have no ecclesiastics. We are ourselves "a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; that we should show forth the praises of Him who has called us out of darkness into His marvellous light." Hence of old the members took an important share in all earnest congregational business. Hence the colleges of prophets established in London by John à Lasco obtained a great popularity, and, with new names, are reviving here and there. The confirmation of new members does not take place without co-operation of the congregation, nor is the possibility excluded of eliminating undesirable candidates. Our deacons at Flushing were formerly obliged to hear the children after the sermon, and to attend the catechising of the young. The other members were not obliged, but had liberty to be there.

The congregation was almost an object of worship. "There is nothing on earth my soul loves so tenderly as the congregation," said Menno Simons. With might and main they tried to keep the congregation holy. "Stainless and spotless" the congregation ought to be, they said, without any needless fear of bigotry, for they were well-advised, rational men.

The congregational discipline was vigorously maintained. The consistory of our congregation at Utrecht cited, for instance, on Nov. 14, 1650, a bride who had been charged with unchastity. At Groningen, in the year 1681, the proposed marriage of one of the members with a second cousin was prevented for two years, because the congregation feared incest. In the eighteenth century, at Edam, one of the brethren was excommunicated on account of adultery with his maid-servant. A sea captain was reproved because he had two guns on board contrary to the commandment of defencelessness. He apologised, saying that he had them only to frighten, if necessary, undesirable guests, but that he did not want to kill with them.

The Communion was, and is, regarded amongst us as a feast in remembrance of Jesus's death, but also as a symbol of brotherly unity. Nay, it was called "the Unity," and in some congregations it was to be deferred when two of the brethren lived on unfriendly terms. As soon as they were reconciled "the Unity" was allowed again.

Public lawsuits were disapproved as a violation of brotherly love, and as a profanation of the congregation.

I need not say that only those who had gained a solid conviction by reflection and experience could be accepted in such a congregation. Hence the baptism of the grown-up young as a symbol of life's consecration to the worship of the accepted Christian principle. The congregation ought to be composed of spiritually grown-up people. And though during the first two centuries of the existence of our community the ministers were not scientifically trained for their charge, but chosen from the brethren, there have often been highly endowed, learned, and eloquent men among them. And though we are now-a-days accustomed everywhere to ministers who have studied at the University, it nevertheless happens that gifted laymen are admitted to the ministry, and women also occasionally ascend the pulpit of some Mennonite congregations.

* A paper read to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Essex Hall, on Thursday afternoon, May 30.

† I use the term "Baptizers" (Doopers, Täufer), in order to distinguish them from the well-known "Baptists," with whom we are sometimes very unjustly confounded.

Appreciating the dear freedom to be ourselves and our best selves, we allow the same right to others and reprobate the imposition of a creed. Hence very different dogmatic views amongst us. Nay, even the immortality of the soul was already questioned by some Mennonites of the seventeenth century.

So the Protestant dogmatic radicalism could not fail, in process of time, to meet our practical radicalism: Antitrinitarianism must meet Mennonitism.

This radicalism has never been unknown to us. Long before Faustus Socinus preached it, the Baptizers, Hans Denck, Ludwig Hätzer, Melchior Hofman, and others were affected with it, and the latter gave no little offence with his bold sentence: "Cursed be the flesh of Maria!" Likewise Hans Kautz von Bockenheim, who said: "Jesus of Nazareth redeems us only if we follow his steps; those who teach differently make an idol of him."

No wonder that the Socinians, persecuted and denied everywhere else, tried to meet us. First in 1598, when Ostorodt and Woidowski came to Amsterdam, where the Reformed magistrate bereft them of their books, and who, disappointed by the public church, endeavoured to win relations with the Mennonite minister, Hans de Ries, at Alkmaar. Afterwards in 1612 they tried to enter into relation with the Dutch Mennonites by intervention of the Mennonite congregation at Dantzic, in Prussia. Though they could not succeed with Hans de Ries, their dogmas won the acceptance of other Mennonite ministers, as J. Outerman, of Harlem, Nittert Obbes, of Amsterdam, and others, and for this relation the Mennonites had to pay: it procured for them a new cross of persecution and suspicion. Socinianism was looked upon as little more than Paganism by the leading Reformed ecclesiastics, and soon the Mennonites were said to be indocti Sociniani, as the Socinians were said to be docti Mennonitæ.

The Dutch Mennonites of the Present Day.

In spite of many difficulties, our community has maintained itself until the present day. Persecution has finally ceased; honoured and esteemed by congenial theologians, we may undisturbedly work for our ideals of practical religious radicalism and for the rights of free individual conviction.

After days of alarming decay and threatening decline in pettiness and worldliness, we enjoy again a time of progress and improvement. Whereas in 1700 we are said to have had 160,000 Mennonite compatriotes, in 1808 there were not even 27,000. Since that time we have been gaining ground again. In the nineteenth century we restored seven lost congregations and established five quite new ones. Our numbers amount at present to about 64,000 souls, of whom about 33,000 are baptised members, and about 11,000 catechumens. They belong to 129 congregations, each of which is quite independent as an autonomous free religious republic.

We have not any Central Authority, Synod, Council, Conference, or anything similar. The consistory of each congregation, chosen by the members, is everywhere the highest authority. Matters of common interest are managed by voluntary co-operation, if necessary by means of societies founded for this or that particular purpose. Congregations, like private persons, may become members by financial subscription or otherwise, according to the Society rules. Congregations which do not desire to be members have no duties, neither rights. Yet their interests are properly attended to. For instance, only forty-one congregations are members of the Universal Mennonite Society (Algemeene Doopsgezinde Societeit); yet all our ministers, except one layman-minister, are pupils of the Seminary which the Society has at the University of Amsterdam.

Yet a considerable number of congregations (about sixty-five) yearly receive a considerable amount from the Society Fund, and besides depend upon its assistance in difficult circumstances. Moreover a proverbial readiness to help and support each other mutually exists between the congregations themselves. The rich congregation of Harlem, Deventer, Utrecht, and other places support several dozens of less wealthy congregations. And this support is granted without any interference with the congregational business of the supported brethren, not even with their financial management. In point of our autonomy we are very particular. Without any central bond the common interests, the spiritual as well as the material interests, are safe—nay, they are perhaps nowhere safer than with us. And though the complete autonomy of all congregations, even of the smallest, has its drawbacks, yet we do not regret it. It is our autonomy which makes us free in regard to the evolution of religious conceptions. Without anger we can follow the progress of modern times, our organisation does not prevent us from introducing what is attractive in what is new, or abolishing what is decrepit in what is old and established. The hymns in our divine services, the organisation of our congregations, the inner mission can therefore be improved without any difficulty.

This state of affairs is not accidental, but has been brought about in course of time. Hence the relatively most liberal religious ideas have always been admitted into our churches, before they made breaches in the great Churches around us. When the first "modern" (i.e. Dutch liberal) minister preached in the Lutheran Church at Harlingen, his hearers said: "He preaches like a Mennonite!" Very remarkable in its simplicity, this saying! Hence, however, our liberalism has usually maintained an earnest character and has not shown that harshness which manifests itself when a hard struggle for its rights deprives this preaching of all mystic element.

Our relationship with the Unitarians and congenial movements is undeniable. The interpretation of Baptism which Faustus Socinus, that wonderful mind, defended almost hopelessly and saw at last accepted by the Synod of Rakov in 1603, is in its main points identical with ours. The Preface of the Rakov Confession expresses no less exactly our conception of the character of a confession as being a quite individual uttering of our best selves. The Mennonites claim the same glory as Unitarianism, to be based not upon a dogmatic creed, but upon the principle of religious freedom and the open trust.

As we appreciate the opinions of those who think differently, we are ready to come to an understanding with congenial brethren. Hence our frequent co-operation with Remonstrants in early times, with Remonstrants, Lutherans, and some sections of the "Protestantenbond" at present. Hence as early as the eighteenth century, and nowadays in many congregations, congenial members are accepted without new ceremonies, by simple inscription on attestation.

Our principles are no longer our private property in Holland. I know it, and I rejoice in the fact that they are now widely adopted. Our general motives are also working elsewhere. Our conceptions are gaining ground. The obligatory oath to which we strongly objected and from which we were at last exempted, is now being undermined; capital punishment, always a crying atrocity in our eyes, against which we pleaded in vain for three centuries, has been abolished in Holland. War, the destroyer of prosperity and mutual trust and of so many ideals of mankind, to which we opposed our principle of defencelessness, is sure to follow the same way in future.

The future will justify our aims, and though our name may not be connected with the victory of our ideals, we may work on with a thankful heart, believing in the usefulness and perpetuity of our free congregations, believing that, amongst numerous other religious thinkers and workers, we are also doing something to hasten the coming of the Kingdom of God.

THE PUNISHMENT OF CRIME.

THERE is an article with this title in the Nineteenth Century and After for July by Robert Anderson, C.B., LL.B., which well deserves the attention of philanthropists, though he goes out of his way to flout them by speaking of "the fads of humanity mongers and doctrinaire philanthropists," and expresses a repugnance for the brutal type of criminal unmitigated by compassion. He says, "If we refuse to have recourse to the thumbscrew and the rack, it is consideration for the community and not the thief that restrains us."

Nevertheless his main contentions, though urged exclusively on grounds of public expediency, as good tactics in a relentless war against crime, are largely in accord with the dictates of compassion for a class so wretched and degraded that we might well prefer to be harmless lunatics, the objects of universal pity. He condemns the stupid cruelty of the present system of dealing with hardened professional criminals, punishing them severely for a period and then releasing them to renew their depredations and incur a fresh term of punishment. It is most cruel to them and involves the police in a Sisyphus labour of re-arresting and convicting them; and innocent people in the loss and suffering occasioned by their periodically renewed crimes. He urges that when a criminal is convicted he should be dealt with according to the result of a careful inquiry into his whole case, so as to give him the best prospect of reformation if there is hope for him, and to afford permanent protection to society if he shows no signs of amendment.

The only rational plea for the existing system is that it inflicts retributory justice for crime, so much crime so much punishment. But what is wanted is justice and mercy for the criminal, combined with efficient protection for society. And those ends are now most imperfectly secured. Heaven only knows what is justice to one who has inherited a bad disposition and a defective brain, and received a vicious and criminal training. It is probable that some moral blame, as distinct from moral aversion, is called for, as some credit attaches to ordinary people for leading non-criminal lives. But that is not much. It would be better to drop the vain pretence of doing justice—for punishment roughly and arbitrarily apportioned to crime is no justice—and to follow the dictates of wisdom and compassion. Any one who is proved to be dangerous may properly be restrained until the danger is removed by training and reformation, whatever fault or misfortune produced the dangerous tendency, provided that no avoidable suffering is inflicted. The necessary restraint if prolonged would be in itself a severe privation, especially if it continued for life. The danger of a permanent loss of liberty would be a strong deterrent from crime. And at the same time, when vindictive punishment was dropped, the prospect of speedy release would be the strongest stimulus to reform. The restraint could be progressively relaxed for those who are too weak to be trusted with complete liberty. And the hardened, hopeless criminal might be permanently secured, and prevented both from renewing his crimes, and from transmitting his miserable inheritance to another generation.

By acting in a scientific spirit on the ascertained facts of every case, the ends of protection and mercy, and probably of justice also, would be best secured. Dr. Anderson writes with full practical knowledge of the punishment of crime as at present administered. That I do not possess. But I have lived within sight of a gaol. The shadow of its sordid hopeless mechanical misery has fallen on my soul. I am revolted by its barbarous stupidity. Matters of common knowledge, which affect most people but superficially, have struck root in my mind. It becomes abundantly clear to me that the Reformatory principle, which accomplishes so much good with juvenile criminals, is capable of considerable extension; and that for the incurably weak or depraved the wise and right principle is that of the Asylum; restraint as much and as long as is necessary, without unnecessary cruelty. And Dr. Anderson who would not hesitate to use the rack for a thief, who is only concerned with the suppression of professional crime, which he thinks could be effected by rational methods, condemns the present system as strongly as any of the "humanity mongers" among whom I should be proud to be enrolled.

LITERATURE.

THE HISTORICAL NEW TESTAMENT.*

THIS admirable book calls for immediate notice, not only because it is admirable, but because it contains so much elaborated matter that if it were put back till all its points could be examined it would be the victim of unmerited delay. The title, which is fully given below, may doubtless create misgivings. Does it not promise too much, especially in venturing on one more translation? For my own part, I confess I opened the book with hesitation, not to say suspicion; I have studied it, however, with increasing satisfaction, and I recommend it with perfect confidence to every earnest student of the Christian Scriptures.

The author, who presents here his first important work, is one of the ablest of the scholars who sat at the feet of the late Dr. A. B. Bruce. It speaks well for the future of Scottish theology that the watchwords of this school, as signally attested in the present work, are thoroughness of research and fearlessness in statement of results. As to the former, this book is in its way worthy to be put alongside the most German of German theology, and in recent English publications has been surpassed only, I should say, by The Hexateuch, of Messrs. Carpenter and Harford-Battersby. As to the latter, every candid reader will observe and appreciate it at once; and not the less because the author, while evidently steeped in liberal criticism, and himself taking a position remarkably liberal considering the supposed orthodoxy in which he has moved, gives now and again in unmistakeable terms his reasons for dissenting from the ultra-radical conclusions which some of us still hold.

The work is certainly to be regarded as a leading contribution in the direction of that reconstruction of opinion on the New Testament literature which has been long awaited. Mr. Moffatt with entire justification repudiates the suggestion which has been offered, with the support of such writers as Canon Gore, and even Canon Driver, that the methods of criticism which have been so fruitfully employed on the Old Testament may not be legitimately applied to the New. This, as he aptly says, is "the rôle of the theological Canute." Based it may be on excellent motives; but faith and truth, in whose interests it is advanced, cannot be so served. The author trusts liberty, and less courageous minds may perhaps get some reassurance from the fact that, after devoting himself to these problems without arrière pensée of any kind, the author arrives at solutions which, while they widely differ from those presented by a crude tradition, are nevertheless evidently adequate to sustain him in a belief in the power of Jesus as a saving force in the soul and in the world. At the same time those who have been perplexed by the different verdicts of critics may also catch gleams of satisfaction from Mr. Moffatt's view of the position to-day. To put it in his own way—

In the order adopted in the present edition, were Ephesians and 1 Peter put (say) ten or twenty years later, Acts brought down nearer to the opening of the second century than I have been able at present to place it, and Matthew (Luke?) similarly thrown back, these slight changes would be almost sufficient to represent an arrangement of the N T literature upon which a large body of liberal criticism at the present day is agreed with practical unanimity (p. 71).

The author is fully aware of the dangers which beset the use of such a presentation of the N T writings. He seeks to guard the reader from these dangers by an emphatic warning. As every intelligent reader of the Scriptures is aware, the Pauline Epistles are of earlier date than the earliest of the Gospels, and they take the first place accordingly in this version. But it would be a great mistake to ignore the evangelic processes which were going on during Paul's lifetime, although they have left no literary record apart from the composite Gospels which were founded on them, and were published later than the date of Paul's death. Mr. Moffatt, it is clear, neither shares, nor wishes the reader of his rearranged N T to share, the notion that Paul's writings are of equal importance with the Gospels. On the other hand he opposes to the saying that "the Epistles are also Gospels" the equally illuminating remark that in a sense "the Gospels are also Epistles." They must be taken, not, indeed, as mere polemics of early Christian theology; yet they naturally and inevitably assume the character of testimonies given with a purpose of edification, quite as much as of dry unbiassed history; and they have a value not merely as records, the only records we have, of the words of Jesus, but also as witnesses to the spiritual life and deeper thought of men who owed to Jesus their chief stimulus to life and thought.

The healthy poise of the author's mind may, perhaps, be best indicated by another quotation, which is all the more refreshing as coming from the quarter whence it does. Many of the extreme liberals, such as Mrs. Humphry Ward, have long since vindicated Baur and his school from the easy abuse which has been cast upon them in the joy of dates "put back" and possible Johannine quotations verified. But hear also Mr. Moffatt:—

Tendency criticism, as I have already said, is a detected idol; but so is the literalism which would read the N T out of all connection with its period. Beyond dispute, the whole meaning of historical criticism implies the existence of such forces and feelings as those which the older critics of the Tübingen school shaped into too rigid a mould. Their main error lay in neglecting personalities for ideas, and in ascribing to deliberate volition what was for the most part either the unconscious effect of prepossession, or the outcome of popular prejudice shared by a large body of the early Christians (p. 61).

Enough may have been said to indicate the tone of the author's mind. The carefulness of his preparation for the very exacting task undertaken by him, though obvious to an attentive reader, is not so easily illustrated. He has studied long and read far. The work abounds in citations of pregnant importance. Without having done more than test a large handful of references taken at random through the book, I must not pretend to give a certificate of perfect accuracy; but

* "The Historical New Testament: being the literature of the New Testament arranged in the order of its literary growth and according to the dates of the documents." A new Translation, edited with Prolegomena, Historical Tables, Critical Notes, and an Appendix, by James Moffatt, B.D. 1 Vol. Pp. xxvii.—726. Price 16s. T. and T. Clark.

I have not "caught him out" so far. The bulk of the critics and authorities quoted are modern, and while they naturally include the chief works by European and American writers of an apologetic and conservative type, it is gratifying to observe the author's familiarity with Drummond, Cone, Carpenter, Cary, Martineau, and others not so well known in this field as they ought to be. The analyses of the several "books" are worked out with care and clearness, especially that of the Apocalypse; and the historical tables are exceedingly interesting, and represent good honest drudgery of the most serviceable type.

Of the quality of the translation—which, by the by, we owe to the difficulty of obtaining permission to use the Revised Version, a difficulty which surely ought not to exist in the case of any serious scholarly work upon the N T—it will be enough to give evidence by citing the rendering of some familiar passages. Thus:—

Rejoice in the Lord always. Again I will say it, rejoice. Let your forbearance be known to all men. The Lord is near. Be anxious about nothing, but in everything by prayer and entreaty together with thanksgiving let your requests be made known before God; so shall the peace of God which surpasses all conception guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus.

Well then, brothers, whatever is true, whatever is serious, whatever is just, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is courteous, all excellence, all praise, keep these in mind!

Now there was a rich man, and he was clothed in purple and fine linen, enjoying a sumptuous life from day to day. And a poor man named Lazarus lay at his gateway: he was a mass of ulcers, and fain to fill himself with what fell from the rich man's table; yes, even the dogs used to come and lick his ulcers.

If you love me, you will keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another advocate to be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth—which the world cannot receive, for the world neither sees it nor knows it; but you know it because it remains with you and is in you. I will not leave you orphans; I am coming to you. A little while yet, and the world no longer sees me; but you shall see me, since I live and since you shall live.

Now after this he was disclosed in a different form to two of them who were walking on their way into the country. And they went off and brought word to the rest: yet they would not believe even them. Afterwards he was disclosed to the eleven themselves, as they reclined at table; and he reproached them for their unbelief and stubbornness of heart, because they would not believe those who had seen him after he rose. And he said to them, "Go into all the world and preach the glad tidings to all the creation: he who believes and is baptized shall be saved, but he who disbelieves shall be condemned."

The reader will see that the passages I have quoted are by no means theological "test" passages, except, perhaps, as giving the neuter pronoun to the "Spirit" in the quotation from "John"; but they will serve to show the freshness, real if rugged, of the translation, and to the reader of Greek they will suggest much more. Any attempt to discuss particular renderings and critical conclusions would be out of place in a brief notice like this; I will only add that, whatever place the work may ultimately win, in my opinion we have here a most welcome addition to the library of every intelligent minister, and a work of deep interest to every cultured layman. W. G. TARRANT.

THE LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY FOR THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

THE work of this Society, of which the Dean of Manchester is Chairman, is of such general interest that our readers will be glad to have some account of it. Recently its claims were pleaded by Miss Mary Dendy, one of the honorary secretaries, at a Sunday morning service in the Downs Congregational Church, Bowdon, the Rev. Dr. Mackennal having courteously invited Miss Dendy to speak from his pulpit. Dr. Mackennal himself conducted the devotional service, and gave a short introductory address, and then Miss Dendy spoke very effectively from the text, "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish." Miss Dendy's words seem to have touched all hearts, and the presence of a Unitarian lady in a Congregational pulpit is a welcome sign of theological breadth. Several donations and annual subscriptions, some of considerable amount, were promptly promised by members of the congregation, which contains many wealthy and generous people, who are among the leaders in various good works.

The Lancashire and Cheshire Society grew out of a report presented by Dr. Ashby to the Manchester School Board on the inspection made by him of defective children in the Board Schools. And Dr. Ashby's inspection had itself been led up to by investigations carried on by Miss Dendy, who, as a member of the School Board, and accompanied by an attendance officer, saw all the 39,000 children in actual attendance. Of these 525 were noted as in some way deficient. The accuracy of Miss Dendy's judgment on these cases was established when Dr. Ashby subsequently interviewed 500 of them, and found that all but ten were either dull and backward or mentally feeble, and of these ten four were deaf mutes, and only six—a fraction over 1 per cent.—were judged by him not sufficiently behindhand to need special attention.

This was three or four years ago. The Society is now near the end of the third year of its operations. Its aim is to provide permanent homes for the feeble-minded in special "Boarding-Schools," to which, as far as possible, all desirable cases will be transferred after passing through special classes in the day-schools. The teaching in these special classes removes, in many cases, to a considerable degree, and in some cases entirely the disabilities which handicap the children. But there remains a large number of boys and girls who are little more able to take care of themselves on leaving school than on entering it. Dr. Kerr, of Bradford, says that it is characteristic of feeble-minded boys that, though able to do some kinds of work, they can never keep their places, and are always in the streets. Feeble-minded girls, quite incapable of self-support by independent action, are yet able to do good work under supervision. In "Scott House," at Hitchin, an average of twenty girls earn no less than £228 per annum by washing and needlework towards their own support.

Rather more than a year ago the Lewis Trustees, acting through Mr. Levy, presented the Committee of the Lancashire and Cheshire Society with a most suitable plot of land, twenty acres in extent, near Sandlebridge, in Cheshire. Five acres of this was handed over in October, and the first "Boarding-School," that for boys, is now in process of erection. Before long it is hoped that sufficient funds will have been secured to enable the Committee to proceed with the second school, which is to be for girls. This will be followed in due course by similar buildings for infants and adults. For the proper carrying out of the scheme £20,000 will be needed, half for building and half for endowment. So far, between £4,000 and £5,000 has been promised in donations, and there is a subscription list of upwards of £200 a year. It is the aim of the Committee to secure local Branch Committees. One of these has been most successfully started at Eccles, and the work of collecting has been divided among a number of willing helpers, who have patiently picked up small sums, amounting altogether to a goodly total. Arrangements are in progress for holding early in the autumn a drawing-room meeting by a member of the congregation of Dunham-road Chapel, Altrincham; and out of this it is hoped that a representative committee will grow.

Certainly no more practical and hopeful work could be taken in hand than that which the new Society has begun. It is filled with the spirit of Christian helpfulness, it aims at such training as will bring out whatever gifts and powers of self-help are possessed by children who are conspicuously below the normal standard of intelligence, and yet are above the sad line marked "idiot" and "imbecile." In an address delivered to the Manchester Statistical Society, Miss Dendy, describing her work with Dr. Ashby, gives one instance (out of many that might be quoted) which shows what even the beginnings of patient sympathy will do with the kind of children whom the Society aims to help. She says:—"We had tried one little fellow in every way, or nearly every way; his mind seemed quite blank. At last Dr. Ashby said: 'I am not much of a hand with my pencil, but let's see what I can do,' and he drew a duck swimming. The boy broke out, 'Quack, quack!' 'Hurrah!' said the doctor, patting him on the back, 'now you take the blacklead and draw a quack-quack.' The boy produced a recognisable copy of the duck."

The Society will remove boys and girls just passing into manhood and womanhood from the temptations into which they must otherwise inevitably fall, and which means for many of them an after-life of criminality and shame; it will do much to prevent the handing on to future generations of the burden of hereditary incapacity. The number of such permanent homes as the Committee is now erecting is at present very small, but the need is pressing everywhere. Miss Dendy (whose address is 13, Clarence-road, Withington, Manchester) and her co-secretary, Dr. J. J. Cox, of Eccles, are constantly receiving appeals for advice and assistance, not only from the neighbourhood of Manchester, but from all over England. At present the law in England does not go so far as in America, where there are custodial homes for feeble-minded girls, in which they may be legally detained after school age. The success of voluntary efforts will, we may hope, in time secure additional legal warrant for the development of the work in England. Thus will crime and misery be diminished, and the feeble-minded will not, in a large proportion as at present, become the fathers and mothers of those afflicted like themselves. D. A.

A HYMN OF THE DAY.

AWAKE my Heart! and play thy part;
Sing forth thine adoration;
Look! for the golden dawn unfurls
Its splendours o'er the nation;
Then while the ploughman turns the soil,
Strike tent, and praise God in thy toil.

Behold the lark that towards the blue
Its quivering flight is winging,
Higher and higher with it bears
Its sacrifice of singing;
Thine also 'tis to scale the light,
Then rise to-day with praises dight.

Or gently flow, and onward go
With sweet emotions welling,
A babbling rivulet of life
On towards the river swelling;
Until, with waters at the flood,
The spirit meets the tides of God.

But when beneath the evening star
The strenuous day is ending,
And humbled hearts and wearied feet
To God and home are wending,
Then lie, my Soul, in His great calm;
No cares shall vex, no storms alarm.

Lie still, my Heart, and, like the grass
Beneath the silence bending,
On which with cool and healing touch
Are dews of night descending—
Thee, in thine utmost helplessness
The Soul of all will find and bless.

H. M. LIVENS.

WE have received from Mr. E. H. Coysh (110, Brighton-grove, Newcastle-on-Tyne) a set of the photographs taken at Catterick on July 13, in connection with the Unitarian Pilgrimage. Of the group, to which we referred last week, there are three photographs, of which those marked A and C appear to us the best. The photograph of the exterior of the church is better than the interior, where the difficulties of light were great. A third view, taken from the garden, shows the vicarage without the pilgrims, and with the church tower looking over the trees. The price of these large mounted photographs is 3s. 6d. each, or, for platinotypes, 5s., with 6d. extra for postage. There are also two cabinet photographs (1s.), one showing the open Register of Marriages, with Theophilus Lindsey's repeated signature, and the other half the page of the Baptismal Register, at the foot of which Lindsey's resignation, "not thro' infirmities of age, but out of a principle of conscience," is recorded. (There were two mistakes in our copy of this entry last week. The correct reading is "thro', not from, infirmities of age;" and "a great benefactor to, not of, this place.") The whole set of photographs may now be inspected in the Book Room at Essex Hall.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THERE were sounds of discontent and almost of quarrelling, as the mother came into the room where Maggie and David were, and the faces of both children looked angry. The children had both been ill lately, but Maggie was well again, and David was getting better. When their mother came into the room they were both silent for a minute, and then David spoke, and said:

"Maggie's so unkind, mother—she won't let me play with her things; not even for a minute."

"He's got his own things, mother, and needn't want mine," said Maggie, as she hugged close in her pinafore a little box of tea-things, and a little omnibus with two white horses.

"Why don't you play with them together, children? You could have much better fun if you did that?" said their mother.

"I want them all to myself for a little while, mother; Maggie's had them ever so long."

"They're mine," said Maggie.

"Where are your own toys, David?" said his mother.

"I don't care for mine," said David impatiently; "she may play with mine, I'm tired of them. I want that omnibus, and I want to set out the tea-things and give tea to the people in the omnibus."

"David, it is not nice to offer Maggie what you don't care for. You must not be selfish and think only of what you want; you must think of what Maggie wants, too. Perhaps she is tired of your toys too."

"She can't be as tired of them as I am; you're not, are you, Maggie?"

"Yes," said Maggie; "I want my own toys to play with."

"Well, Maggie, if you don't wish to lend them to David, I think you might both give tea to the people in the omnibus: you can be the landlady, and David can be the waiter. I am sure they would like their tea best if it was well and quickly served. Come with me, Maggie, and I will give you some real tea in your little tea-pot, and a bit of cake to cut up; and whilst you are getting the tea ready, David can be the stable-boy, if you leave the omnibus for him to take care of."

"No, I'll be the driver, mother, and bring the 'bus home full of people," said David.

Maggie's cross little face brightened, and she unwrapped her crumpled pinafore, and took out the omnibus, and gave it to David, and ran away with her mother for the tea and cake. She soon came back, and they spread Maggie's pocket-handkerchief on a stool and put the tea-things out on it; and they had a very happy tea party, with an imaginary company out of the omnibus; they were soon laughing merrily.

Before Maggie went to bed, and after David was asleep, she went in to say good-night to her mother, who was working. A book was on the table, and as Maggie stood beside her knee the mother said, "Maggie dear, there is a little piece of poetry here, which I used to be very fond of. Will you read it? I think you will like it." She handed her the book, and Maggie sat down on the stool and read it. It was called "Harry's Horse," and this was it:—

The baby lies in her mother's arms,
Quiet, and pale, and thin,
But the little head is once more raised
As Harry comes bounding in.

A wooden horse in his hand he holds,
Dark grey, with a long black mane;
And an eager, longing look lights up
The pale little face again.

"No, baby dear, I will hold it close,
But I cannot give it to you;
I'm afraid you would let it fall, and break
My horse so pretty and new."

But the pale little eager face still pleads,
Outstretched is the small hand still,
He stands for a moment, then holds it out,
"I'll lend it baby—I will!"

That day is past, and he finds it again
Where the baby had thrown it aside,
Her coral red, with its silver bells,
Still fast to the bridle tied.

There's a touch of paint off the bright green stick,
And a chip off the horse's ear;
But, O! not that to the boy's blue eye
Brings the quickly gathering tear.

And while Harry lives he will still be glad
That he lent her his horse that day;
For the baby has gone where never again
She can ask with his toys to play.

Maggie sat very still, and at last stood up and put her arms round her mother's neck, and said in a whisper, "Did the baby die, mother?"

"Yes, dear," she answered, and took Maggie on her knee.

The tears came into Maggie's eyes, and she was silent. Her mother gently stroked her hands.

At last Maggie said, "Mother, David isn't going to die, is he?" and she looked frightened.

But her mother smiled and said, "No, dear; not yet, I trust. But, Maggie, some day we must all die, and we do not know who will go first. And then, if we have not been kind to the one who goes, we shall be sorry. You see Harry was kind to his little sister, and he was glad always after, and we ought all to be like Harry, and willing to give up what we care for to others.

"Mother, David is rough, and I thought he might break my things," said Maggie.

"Yes, dear, so did Harry, but he lent his horse because he loved his dear baby, and wanted to make her happy."

"Must I always give up, mother? mustn't David give up too?"

"Yes, certainly he must, and I think he will another time; but this time it was he that asked, and you who refused. Wasn't it much nicer to play together than for you to hide your toys in your pinafore lest David should have them?"

"Yes," said Maggie brightly, "it was a very nice tea party; and, mother, all those people did enjoy it. They told us so. There were twenty people—and we were busy; and David fed the horses. Good-night, mother, and thanks for the tea and cake!"

And with a good hug she ran off to bed. GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

"BACK TO JESUS."

THE members of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, who asked that the annual sermon preached at their meeting at Oldham last June by the Rev. R. TRAVERS HERFORD should be printed, rendered a good service, for which we are grateful to them, as we are in still larger measure to the preacher himself. "Back to Jesus" is the title of the sermon,* which is a clear and earnest statement of the true basis and meaning of Christian discipleship, resting on ample knowledge and deep personal conviction.

"Back to Jesus" is the return from the theological shadows to the great light that cast those shadows. It is a prophetic word, and waits yet for its fulfilment. It contains the promise of a nobler humanity and a fairer world, as men learn at last to realise the full meaning of the Gospel of Jesus; and putting away all shrinking fear, stand beside him in the glorious fellowship of the children of God, in mutual service of unselfish goodness, men and nations living together after the manner and in the spirit of Jesus—not calling him Lord, Lord, but doing the will of their Father who is in Heaven.

Such is the aspiration in which Mr. HERFORD'S sermon culminates, after he has shown step by step how that return to JESUS himself is to be effected, and how as a matter of religious experience it stands related to other forms of faith which through the centuries have claimed to be the true Christian Gospel. The return, Mr. HERFORD says, must be "to the real JESUS himself, as he was before PAUL was converted, or the Synoptic Gospels had been written, or the Ephesian Presbyter had meditated on the Incarnate Word"; and he shows how conviction is brought home to the disciple by those great words contained in the Gospel record, which so far transcend the spiritual level of the reporters, that they must belong to some great Teacher, out of whose inward life alone they can have come—and to none other can they bear witness than to JESUS himself. Such words are found in the Beatitudes and the LORD'S Prayer, in other passages of the Sermon on the Mount, and in many of the Parables, notably that of the Prodigal Son. It is true, Mr. HERFORD admits, that some of these sayings can be paralleled in Jewish literature, at any rate, to some extent, in the form of their utterance, but not in regard to the thought. "About half the LORD'S Prayer can be paralleled in stray sentences of the Jewish literature, but for the Prayer as a connected whole, greater than the sum of its parts, there is no parallel to be found in the Rabbinical writings, JESUS alone is the author of it." And while we find in such words an unmistakable witness to the great Teacher, it is not merely to one who pronounced a series of moral and religious lessons; for in those greatest words "he uttered himself, stamped the image of his own mind and soul upon his spoken thoughts." The truths he taught were the realities amidst which he lived. "In apprehending them, we come to know him, as in truth, and, indeed, he really was." And what we thus learn of the religion of JESUS himself, Mr. HERFORD describes in the following passage :—

> Jesus usually spoke of God by the name of Father, and all his utterances imply a deep and constant sense of God's nearness to him; a perfect harmony of spirit, of which the basis was love, and the expression complete trust and perfect obedience. It was not that he taught certain things about God, by way of a theology; but that he was at all times conscious of the presence of God; he lived his whole life in that presence, that mighty companionship. The sense of it filled his mind, and inspired his thought. Therefore, whatever he said or did naturally flowed from his inner consciousness of God. And if, instead of the words he did say, he had spoken other words, they no less would have borne witness to the character of the source from which they flowed. "Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." Think what he must have been, to whom the words of the Lord's Prayer represented realities of present religious experience, and not merely ideals to be some day reached. The Lord's Prayer is, doubtless, very simple and plain, when regarded as a body of teaching, and, indeed, is none the worse for that. But we get back to the real Jesus when we see in him, not the man who merely taught the Lord's Prayer, but the man who lived the Lord's Prayer.

This revelation of one whose life was sustained and inspired by a constant sense of communion with GOD, showing to us what must be the true spirit of our own life, has its whole meaning in the fact that the revealer was essentially one of ourselves, in no sense more than man or other than man. As such JESUS speaks to us, and his words go home with quickening power; only so could he minister to the needs of our common nature and lead us into the FATHER'S presence, that we may fulfil our heavenly destiny and live our own lives as children of GOD.

Every one of the records of the life and teaching of JESUS is coloured, Mr. HERFORD shows, by the writer's own conceptions of religion and of what the Teacher must have been, and it is through these conceptions that we have to penetrate to the man himself and his own supreme revelation. Even the Synoptic Gospels have their theory, picturing JESUS as the Messiah of his nation and a worker of miracles.

That view is the result of the impression produced by the personality of Jesus upon the ordinary Jewish mind. The whole idea of miracle belongs to the lower planes of spiritual life, not to the higher; it was natural that the evangelists should write the life of Jesus in terms of miracle, since that was the only way they knew of representing the influence of spiritual power. But the possessor of transcendent spiritual power does not need to descend to the method of miracle to make its influence felt. Miracles—to those who believe in them—are only appeals to the sense of wonder made by display of power over material things. And while they may do well enough for the second and third rate religious leaders of history, they are surely out of all keeping with the supreme spiritual greatness of Jesus. The miraculous element in the Gospel story gives no dignity to the figure of Jesus which was not there before, does not make him any the more the perfect child of God than he was without it. On the contrary, it is the towering greatness of Jesus, the real man as he actually was, that gives to the miraculous element in the Gospels any claim to respect or attention which it may be thought to possess.

In the Pauline Epistles and in the Fourth Gospel, from their different standpoints, the theory of CHRIST'S nature is even more pronounced, and further removed from the reality of his humanity. Those writings teach us much of the influence of JESUS upon later disciples; but their theories and the whole scheme of orthodox doctrine based upon them are foreign to the mind of the Master himself; they have served to establish a mediatorial religion; whereas the revelation of JESUS is of a religion by which each human soul has direct access to the FATHER.

We might sum up the meaning of the revelation in Jesus in the formula "As God is to Jesus, so God is to every human soul." It is for the disciple to be as his master, and in simple trust to act on that principle, to look up to God as being in real and literal truth his Father in Heaven; to realise that God is indeed such, and that as Jesus stood in close and immediate relation with Him, so also the disciple stands in close and immediate relation with God. There was certainly no mediator between Jesus and God. Equally, if there be any truth of spiritual fact in the revelation of Jesus, there is, and can be, no mediator between man and God. What place is there for a mediator between child and Father? The two ideas are mutually exclusive; and Christianity which has sought a mediator thereby proclaims that it does not feel God to be a Father, however much it call Him so.

Thus Mr. Herford's appeal is that we shall dare to make the great confession, and in a true human companionship with Jesus, "Arise, and go to the Father." The God-man, set by the theologians between us and the Father in heaven, confuses our thought and directs our endeavour to a lower level of spiritual achievement; with Jesus himself we find no such intermediary image to distract and hinder our aspiration, or keep us from child-like surrender to the Highest.

This same appeal Mr. Herford has also made in a lecture on "Jesus Christ," in his volume of "Unitarian Affirmations" just published. That lecture concludes as follows:—

"I believe in Jesus." That is my last word; and I say it with all the strength and energy of conviction that I can put into words. If I may, I would fain be his disciple, and live the daily life of common cares and duties in his spirit of sonship to God. The world may say I am no Christian. I do not look to the world, I look to him. And though, with Peter, I am ready to say, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord," with Peter also I will say, "Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life."

I may not worship him. I could not worship him. The Heavenly Father only—Father alike of Jesus and of all other men—Him alone can I worship, therein doing what Jesus did. But I look up to Jesus as to the "great Friend of all the sons of men," and, in the humble man of Nazareth, discern the unimagined splendour of a perfect soul.

We need not be troubled, as it seems to us, by any metaphysical question of perfection in a human soul, but simply hold to the reality of our spiritual experience, which finds in Jesus the true lineaments of a child of God, and the fullest measure of that life of communion with the Father, to which as it touches us the inward witness compels our allegiance, as the goal of our endeavour. Our great need is to be confident that we are being led onward and upward in the true way of life, and this confidence we have in companionship with Jesus, because with him, living in the spirit of his life, who is the Chief of faithful souls, we find our vision clearest, our courage most indomitable, and our communion with the Father deepening into perfect love and trust.

The first list of contributions to the Ministers' Superannuation Fund will be again found advertised on our back page this week, a list so far augmented that the promised donations now amount to £11,439 19s. 6d., and the annual subscriptions to £162 12s.

BEFORE THE HOLIDAYS.

BY THE REV. H. M. LIVENS.*

"A multitude keeping holy day."—Ps. lii. 4.

"The bread of God is that which cometh down out of heaven and giveth life unto the world."—John vi. 33.

"You must be happy so as to give happiness. You must give joy if your life is to be joyful. Start with a smile yourself, so those about you will learn to smile. Then, when we see their faces aglow, our affected pleasure will become real." So I venture to put the wise words of Maeterlinck. We will return to them in a minute or two.

With the exception of the small minority who have already enjoyed (or suffered) some sea or land change, everybody is now looking forward to the holidays. Many are already on the move. Others are making their preparations. All are under marching orders and most, I suppose, have by now made up their minds where they will march to. You, too, will be scattering yourselves about the country and joining in the universal "Sound of a going," will be seeking to escape the toils of civilisation on cycle, boat, and train.

This being so, it seems fitting that we should turn our minds to our holidays. And you see when we go back to the beginning of holidays and note how they arose in the holy-days—the feasting and the fasting days of the Church—the part of religion in connection therewith becomes evident. It is no impertinence to fit the words of the Psalmist on to British customs in the nineteenth century and to interweave with our Sabbath worship joyful anticipations of going with the throng out of the houses of men into the great and shining house of God and with voice of laughter and of praise keeping holiday. For these our holidays are amongst the holy days of our lives. They are days consecrated to the creation or recovery of health and happiness—and so, like not a few of our pleasures, they become a binding duty—a duty because it is our duty to create happiness in the earth—we are children of light not of darkness—and as Maeterlinck says, "We must be happy before we can give happiness," but we cannot be happy unless we are strong and healthy; and if conversely we must give joy provided our own life is to be joyful, we had better begin with even the mere form of joy if that may bring contentment to another, so their real happiness will perhaps make us happy too. But how much better if our creation of pleasure is spontaneous, and not merely dutiful to start with. But the nature that creates gladness spontaneously is the healthy nature—that alone, the physically healthy, the intellectually healthy, the morally healthy, and this is a kind of nature which does not exist without holidays.

The first benefit that usually accrues to a man from his holiday is the regeneration of his temper. The late Bishop of London when addressing the great Christian Endeavour Convention at the Alexandra Palace, gave his hearers this one practical recommendation: "Take care of your temper, and your energies will take care of themselves."

Temper is a complex product—the product of all that lies between philosophy and digestion—but it lies at the root of both comfort and character. Ah, how blessed is the season that releases the spirit that is galled by the shackles of daily anxiety and strain! Go where new power may be gained that will snap those shackles. Let the free winds blow away the dust from off us. Go

And in the sea waves drown the restless pack
Of duties, claims, and needs that barked upon their track.

Our natures tend under too protracted routine of work and study to become rigid and mechanical, and so we go out on to or into the sea that leaps and roars in its own glorious freedom; we climb the mountain sides on which are rude rocks but no milestones and no fences of custom; we sail and cycle and go sightseeing in order to be taken out of ourselves, or we rest our worn nerves and wearied limbs in Nature's quiet, shady hermitages, and we come back better men and women, gladder children—we come back from it all more defiant of difficulty, more magnanimous, more sensitively honourable.

And we need, and get, not only the touch of Nature's strenuous life awaking us from spiritual apathy; not only her liberty to break up our crushed artificiality; not only her life to vitalise us; we want also to be bathed in Nature's purity—to get, for a few weeks, so far out of the squalor, not only of poverty but of all the mean side of our civilisation, its over-culture and its over-wealth, its pedantry and its pride; until, in the untainted breezes, in the boundless flowing light, in the solemn night silences—for we do spend an hour sometimes when on our holidays in looking at the stars and letting them look at us,—until thus we get our hearts cleansed by God, and renew a right spirit within us. For we find that, after all, the world is God's, not ours nor other people's; it is not all the world of the politicians, of the hucksters, or even of the philosophers; but it is God's glorious world, on whose hills and in whose heaven He dwells.

You will for the time being, probably, become somewhat negligent of public worship. I do not say that you will ignore it. I know not your customs, but I know the customary tendency, even among confirmed Church-goers. Here, too, the traces are unbuckled. You worship, awhile, without a company, without walls, without any machinery of devotion.

I am not going to try to persuade you to maintain during the recess the precise system of worship which we deem so salutary and so helpful during the ordinary course of our home lives. Even should I make such an attempt you would, I fear, pay no heed to my words. I am not going to say that the temporary neglect of public worship is wrong, for I do not think it is. I think it is rather right, and the occasional breach endorses the wisdom of the general observance. For my own part I appreciate the opportunities afforded by a vacation for listening and taking part with a congregation. The position is one of the fresh, and hence refreshing, events of a holiday to me. Yet this I do not feel, and would not impose as a constraint. For the holiday Sabbath, even out of Church, has its own charm and blessing. It is just then, in the stiller and more subdued intervals during the active pursuit of pleasure, that we become very sensitive to the nearness of the Eternal. His temple all round us, His day present without appointment by bell or book.

* A Sermon preached at Christ Church, Brighton.

Neath cloister'd boughs each floral bell that swingeth
And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
Makes Sabbath in the fields and ever singeth
A call to prayer.

But the noteworthy thing about the finer kind of benefit we derive from a holiday is that it comes to us for the most part unsought—the strength being imparted to our souls is, perhaps, at the time unfelt. It is given to us as manna from heaven. The food of our natures, like those natures themselves, is not altogether of the earth, earthy; it also is wonderful, mystic, spiritual.

Astronomers assure us that scores of tons of meteoric matter are added each day to the previous mass of the earth. No one sees anything of the fall of this weight of minerals save when he catches sight of a shooting star—a fragment hurtling through our atmosphere until the friction ignites and consumes it, leaving its impalpable ash to dust our earth—where it is found on Alpine snows, in Atlantic ooze, and in the motes of the sunbeam. The very grains of corn that go to make our daily bread owe something to, this gentle rain of meteoric matter as well as to gentle rains of a more familiar description. The loaf as it comes to our table, says Sir Robert Ball, contains within it particles which have voyaged for uncounted thousands of centuries of time through illimitable millions of miles of space. Thus to build up our bodies the remotest realms of space have been laid under contribution. That contribution to the mass of the world is continued unceasingly, by night and by day, year in, year out.

But not only to the body comes food out of the heavens unsought, unseen. To the soul not less, life and nutriment of life is given by ways and times that pass our measurement and reckoning. We depend not only on bread that is raised from the earth by the sweat of man, but equally on "bread of God which cometh down out of heaven and giveth life to the world." This bread is not weighed in scales. It happens at times that we find we have grown strong upon it, morally strong—spiritually vital and clear-seeing—and yet we know not how or when we were fed. This is peculiarly the case during our holidays. We do not embark upon them with the primary object of exalting our characters, but rather of gaining rest and enjoyment. But while, as Whittier finely says, we go forth to "assume the unconcern of sun and air," and purpose and deliberate far less than is our wont, the end finds us new beings—with cleaner minds, quicker consciences, sturdier wills, with higher aspirations and closer fellowship with the music of creation and with the beauty of truth and right.

Not that all mental and spiritual increase which we derive from a holiday comes to us in this undesigned and unpremeditated manner in this gentle rain of power and health to the spirit. On the other hand, we go forth into the wilderness of set purpose to see—to see the reeds shaken by the wind, to see and hear the wild birds wheeling and screaming round the crags, to gather up in photograph and sketch old towers of ruin and glens of beauty. We watch the ripening glory of the harvest, and then the poetry of the reaping and garnering. The summer holiday is our grand annual opportunity to see Nature—nay, with steady eye, day after day, to watch the Almighty at work. How does He work on the bridge top of the summer? Now is the very heat and burden of His day. By-and-by, with winter, will come silence and rest for the World-maker. But now, in these lands, He is feeding the trees in His garden. With His marvellous alchemy He is turning the water and salts of the earth into water of life, until the trees of the Lord are full of sap, and their branches covered with leaves are feasting upon sunshine. Lung and mouth and digestive organ is the leaf. It breathes, it feeds the tree—so it grows, so it beareth fruit. This, we go forth to be in the midst of and to watch—to feel, at any rate, how it is going on around us; every green thing thrilling with the power of life.

Yes, we, whose resting, recreating days are not only pass-times but are holy-days—holy through mirth and indolence and exercise—go forth to draw a little nearer to the Father. The God whom we have missed in the earthquake of political convulsion, in the fire of tragic events, comes to us in the voice of the gentle stillness which pervades our retreat among the fastnesses of the wilderness. Spent, and feeling ourselves badly served in our sphere and victimised by our fellows or our fate, we have fled from it—fled with our trust as well as our strength spent—disbelieving in the genuine goodness and fidelity of men. I only have been loyal, and to what profit? we perhaps say. "All the precepts of love, all the preachings of the gospel, seem a hollow mockery," says a good and earnest woman, in a letter I hold in my hand. In such words we do exclaim when we have grown tired and perplexed and blind to many things and can see only one—and that the evil one.

But when we have retired to the mountain streams, and the heather of the moorlands is drenched in purple all round us, and the clamour of men has ceased, the sound mind comes back to us. We form juster estimates. We judge more broadly, We see that we cannot have been the sole faithful ones—seven, yea, 70,000 knees have not bowed down to mammon worship. God has witness borne to Him up and down the earth in sound hearts, in happy homes, in brave endeavours. And so we take heart of grace once more, and, like the despondent prophet who found fresh consecration and courage on Horeb, we return from our holidays, and I trust that you will in due time return from yours, knowing that we have all been set apart by God for some duty in the land, and that we shall be sustained, if we are faithful, by strength to carry it out.

THE June Matriculation List of the University of London shows that there were not less than 2,752 candidates, of whom over 1,000 were placed in the first division, and 275 in the second. In the Honours Division are the names of thirty-eight candidates, among whom we are glad to see that Dorothy Tarrant (Clapham High School), daughter of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, stands twelfth. Channing House has two pupils, C. B. Kibble and B. Rendall, in the first division, and one, J. G. Pilkington, in the second.

AN ICELAND HOLIDAY.

You, Mr. Editor, in your peremptory manner, have demanded of me some account of my Icelandic holiday. We are just touching at Leith on our way from Reykjavik to Copenhagen by the Danish steamer Botnia. Here letters crowd upon me, including a belated contribution from "Harmony's 'Cello" for "Our Youngest Brother." I hope that instrument generally keeps better time. I have put together for one newspaper some notes on Iceland politics; for another I have jotted down what I have learnt of Icelandic church and temperance work, including the story of how I was booked for a speech in my best Norwegian to the fisher folk of Reykjavik—with a sprinkling of Althing's men—and how I was rewarded with the exquisite and romantic singing of Young Iceland. But to tell of the holiday itself is a harder matter. I have never travelled anywhere where I have felt so absolute a despair of conveying to friends at home any conception of what I saw. I did not even suffer from my usual vain longing that I could paint; for I knew that the painter does not exist who could interpret with the brush these cliffs and seas, these magic fjords, these millions of screaming birds, these vast, weird moors, these marvels of Thingvellir — classic ground—with its gullies and chasms, its great walls of rock suddenly revealed below the plain, its volcanic rifts with the clear black-blue waters fifty feet below the precipice's edge. The summer has been the rainiest, the coldest Iceland has known for many a long year. One is almost thankful for it. For if to the glories of earth and water had been added the miraculous glories of the Icelandic skies, who could retain his self-control in the midst of such enchantments?

We were a goodly fellowship on board the Botnia, Danes and English mingling happily so far as the exigencies of language permitted. From the Danes the English learnt to lift their hats on every possible occasion. From the English the Danes learnt some things too—chiefly that though far-off lands may be very beautiful and their peoples profoundly interesting, yet the true object of travel is to fish salmon in unspoilt rivers. But we had men on other errands bent—a South Shields clergyman making pious pilgrimage to the grave of a friend lost years ago far up among the cliffs lining the north-western fjords; Dr. Grossmann, of Liverpool, eager to visit the Leper Hospital in the interests of medical science; Professor Morgan, of Bristol College, full of knowledge of booby and tern, puffin and guillimot, and entranced by the wondrous volcanic formations of Iceland and the Faröes; and a little band of brave men who—inspired by the tourist agencies in London—dared the fatigues of five days' travel from hummock to hummock on pony-back, that they might see Thingvellir, the Geysers, and the Gull-fos.

As for us, we did the thirty-five miles to Thingvellir in a little governess's cart, the only carriage I saw in Iceland. Three passengers and driver, with sufficient baggage for a night's sojourn, made a pretty close pack. A pony in the shafts and a relief pony tied alongside made up our equipment. "A good road for bicyclists," says the guide-book. I should be sorry for the cyclist. Lumps of rock ten or twelve inches above the roadway, or swamps of mud, for eight hours you had the alternation. When the pony thought well, he stopped; and when he came to a river he was for climbing down the bank as a protest against the new-fangled bridge; and when he thought us unreasonable, he backed regardless of precipices. But he meant it all well, and ponies and driver and tourists were all in good humour with each other.

The marvels of Thingvellir who shall describe? The guide-books, not I. Here was the rock of drowning, there the pool of blood, here the rock of proclamation, there the ruins of the "booths," in one of which Thorgeir lay three days and nights with the sheepskin drawn over his face, deliberating whether the old gods of Scandinavia or Jesus, the Christ, should be the god of Iceland in the generations to come. All the people had bound themselves to accept his decision; for he was wise. And he came forth and pronounced for Christ.

Altogether one experiences at Thingvellir what, I suppose, one can experience nowhere else in the world—the sense that you are on the ground of epic heroes of a classic age, a spot redolent of ancient deeds and counsels of Homeric flavour, yet all real, historic, actual, minutely known, and lying at the basis of the life and feeling of the people in whose midst you are. The stories of the Viking heroes and the Sagas are more to the Icelander than Iliad and Odyssey to Pericles and Demosthenes. The romance, the sense of land and race, that has its birth in mythology is realised in an actual historic record. Ibsen, with incomparable genius, has given to Norway the "Warriors of Helgeland," in "Fru Inga of Oestraat," and still more in "Brand" and "Peer Gynt," something of the like romantic consciousness. But the Icelander draws it from sober historic annals in which, none the less, the stature of men is as that of demi-gods, and their thought and passion are of epic simplicity and grandeur.

But it was sea-travel, not land-travel, on which my friends and I were bent. So presently, while comrades were still bumping on pony-back, we sailed forth for that fringe of fjords and promontories on the north-west of Iceland, close on the Arctic Circle, which looks on the map like the tentacles of one of the jelly-fish abounding in these northern waters. Arne-fjord, Dyre-fjord, Isa-fjord, we visited them in succession. The great volcanic mountains that fringe the fjords, arrayed like soldiers on either side in rigid lines, each comprising a vast amphitheatre scarred and seamed by the lava flow, lend them a stateliness with which Norway can hardly vie. If the stench of the whale-factory floats across the waters, you forgive it for the glory of the scene. Far up north lies the little village of Isa-fjord, "the second town of Iceland," proud with a roll of 1000 inhabitants, against Akureyri's 800. It is scattered over a tongue of shingly land standing out from the mountain and is everywhere strewn with the drying cod. . . .

But mail boats wait for no man. I must be off to Copenhagen.

AUCKLAND UNITARIAN CHURCH.

SIR,—Some weeks ago you published an interesting and stirring appeal from the Rev. W. Jellie, B.A., minister of the Unitarian congregation recently formed at Auckland, New Zealand. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have taken a great interest in this movement and are giving a liberal annual grant towards the support of the Unitarian cause at Auckland. They have ample evidence that Mr. Jellie is doing excellent work there, and ought to be supported. The congregation have had great difficulty in obtaining a suitable building in which to hold their services. They have now the offer of a piece of land in a central position, a design for an iron church has been prepared, and the building will be erected as soon as funds are provided. The total cost will be about £700, and the congregation have already raised among themselves upwards of £200, and will raise £100 more. It would be a gracious act on the part of the Unitarians of England if they could send out the balance of the sum required, £400. The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made a grant of £25, and the following sums have already been promised:—

Mrs. G. Buckton	3	0	0
Mrs. J. E. Carpenter	2	0	0
Miss E. J. Garrett	5	0	0
Miss M. Hall	1	0	0
Mrs. Hollins	5	0	0
Miss Preston...	5	0	0
Mr. S. S. Tayler	5	0	0
Lieut.-Colonel W. R. Trevelyan...	2	2	0

I should be glad to receive and forward to the congregation at Auckland any contributions which are sent to Essex Hall.

W. COPELAND BOWIE.

July 24.

THE appeal recently made by the Rev. W. Jellie on behalf of the Building Fund for a Church in Auckland is enforced by the above letter from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; and in the same connection we are glad to be able to add the following passages from a letter we recently received from Miss Lucy M. Turner, of Stoke Newington, who with her sister attended service at Auckland on a Sunday in May:—

Early on Sunday morning we started to find the hall, and with the help of a Baptist minister were directed to Oddfellows' Hall in one of the numerous side streets of the city. We entered a square compact little building, holding about 160 comfortably. A table stood in front of the reading-desk decorated with flowers, and another at the entrance neatly laid out with pamphlets and tracts by our best known ministers. These we noticed afterwards were readily taken away by the congregation. We had a word or two with Mr. Newland, the hon. sec., who, I believe, originated the movement, and wrote to the British and Foreign Association for help and for a minister some two years ago.

At about 10.45 Mr. Jellie came in, and was as much surprised to see familiar faces from London as we were to be there. It seems the custom in New Zealand to have a small morning congregation, and so we found it here, for not more than thirty members were present. Mr. Jellie announced from the pulpit that the weekly collection of the previous Sunday amounted to over £6, which gave us some idea of the support derived from the church itself. £2 is set aside regularly for current expenses, and the surplus handed over to the Building Fund.

After the service the members of the congregation met in a little ante-room, where they chatted, and some took books from the library, containing both theological and secular works. At present there is only a small collection, but Mr. Newland, the librarian, said it was much appreciated, and added that colonials liked more advanced thoughts than people at home—a point with which I disagreed.

We had a short talk with Mr. Jellie, who seems very happy and hopeful in his work. He has a good healthy congregation of men and women of all ages, the younger predominating. He finds very little difficulty in bringing them together and so strengthening the cause. In the afternoon he told us he holds a children's service, which is different from the Sunday-schools at home, for the children are of a different stamp, and need a different kind of treatment, but Mr. Jellie seems successful in his arrangement of this service.

At the evening service there were about 150 people—independent, strong men and women, not wealthy, but thoroughly self-supporting. The singing was hearty, and altogether you felt yourself in a living church, with a good body of fellow-worshippers around you, unlike some of our home churches with a scattered audience. After the service I overheard one of the congregation say to his neighbour: "Well, we have the best man they could have sent us," and his neighbour heartily agreed. There was every sign of growth and strength, and many little things we heard proved that Mr. Jellie has a right to be proud of his work in the Colonies.

The following day Mr. Jellie took us up Mount Eden, some 600 feet high, rising in one of the corners of the town. From the summit we saw Auckland, a city of sixty years growth, stretching at our feet on three sides, with a population of 60,000 living in houses small and large. Beyond lay the harbour with its calm waters running in and out of many bays. But the point of interest to us was this. Pointing to one of the most thickly populated parts of the city, Mr. Jellie showed us where he wanted to see the spire of a Unitarian church—the first in the colony—an historic church.

We bade good-bye to our friend on board our steamer, and he asked us to remember him kindly to all his friends and acquaintances at home, and tell them all that was hopeful and cheerful of his work out here.

Although colonials boast of their freedom of thought and life, yet we came across many who looked aghast at our religion, and there are many quack preachers who come from all parts of the world and hold meetings in the small halls, so that we feel the necessity of a visible church which will strengthen the cause and stand to show the meaning and truth of Unitarianism.

OF the South Wales annual meeting held at Llandyssul on Tuesday and Wednesday, we hope to publish a full report next week.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK IN AUCKLAND.

We understand here that the eyes of the British world are following with interest the Colonial tour of the Heir Apparent to the Throne.

The Prince and Princess have just passed through Auckland, and we all feel that their visit has been an historic event, and one of no ordinary significance. We appreciated highly the devotion to duty and self-sacrifice on the part of King Edward in consenting to part with his son for a world cruise at a time when private grief enjoys the privilege of family support and sympathy; and it seems abundantly clear that neither he nor the nation will have cause to regret his patriotic and magnanimous action. To have lent the éclat of the Prince's presence to the opening of the first Federal Parliament of the new born nation of Australia was much, and wholly befitting the importance of the occasion, the inauguration of a new era in the history of the nation and its dependencies, an occasion without parallel in history, so great that imagination almost fails to grasp its full meaning and probably altogether fails in foreshadowing its consequences. But here in New Zealand, a thousand miles further on, where the tide of popular opinion flows strongly against any plan of Federation, the effect of the Royal visit will be no less strongly marked. It will broaden the outlook of the people, who are, from the nature of their position, extremely provincial; it will add its link to that chain of events, which, within the last few years, has brought about such a wonderful change not only in the feelings of the Motherland towards her colonies, but also of the colonies towards the Motherland.

In the present surge of the Imperialistic idea, out of which so much political capital is being made, it is forgotten that the laissez-aller policy, now sneered at as Little Englandism, not only served its turn in fostering the independent and free development of the colonies, in contrast with the policy of interference which lost us the United States, but also that it was gladly acquiesced in by the colonists themselves. Australasians were quite satisfied with existing conditions and did not desire any closer union with Great Britain. Nay, many of their leaders openly advocated Separation, and evidently looked for their ideal to cutting the painter and following the career of the American Commonwealth.

Now all that is changed. Our provincial and colonial loyalty has broadened into a loyalty of race, and we proudly declare Civis Britannicus Sum.

So, firstly, as the representative of the Crown, the nexus of communities whose internal life is otherwise independent; secondly, as one who brings us near again in spirit to home and fatherland; and, thirdly, as the grandson of the revered and beloved ruler, in affection for whom we found our unity of interest, we have done our best this last week to give a hearty welcome to the Duke of York.

On Monday the Ophir, with her sea-dog escort, steamed into our beautiful harbour—"Last, loneliest, loveliest, exquisite, apart," not in "the smiles of the unswerving season," but in the mist and rain that make our winter. On Tuesday, however, the sun shone, and the Prince made his way through garlanded streets, thronged with eager crowds of people, with cheers and what military display our colonial volunteers can give. On Wednesday he reviewed about 4,000 local troops. It was an imposing sight, and gave one a good idea of the reception that an invader will have to reckon upon if these outlying parts of the Empire are ever attacked. Prominent in the field were five hundred cadets, lads of the upper standards of the public schools, who are now drilled and disciplined in military fashion, and who marched past as proudly and steadily as any of the older companies. What this movement betokens for the future, whether good or ill, I leave for wiser heads to prognosticate. Let us hope that the object at which as an army they will aim, will always be Defence and Peace, not war and self-aggrandisement, and then none will take exception.

On the same day a more modest and yet equally important function was the laying of the foundation-stone—not of our Unitarian Church, I wish it were—of a training school for Maori girls, which will exert a beneficent influence among the natives of raising the standards of their home life, and furthering their progress in civilisation. New Zealand is justly proud of its treatment of that splendid race, whose good qualities it has learnt to appreciate both in war and peace. It was with a sense of unfeigned joy that we heard when the last census returns were published that the Maoris were actually on the increase. It looks as if the native problem were being successfully grappled with.

Our illustrious visitors are now at Rotorua, that wonderland of boiling springs and general volcanic activity, the Mecca of Maoridom, receiving the enthusiastic welcome of some thousands of Maoris, who are assembled there from north and south to greet, according to their own ancient customs, the grandson of their great white mother, Wikitoria. Of all the sights the Duke and Duchess are likely to see on their tour, this must be the most striking, this loyal gathering of the Maori clans, numbers of whom were themselves defending their pas or burning settlers' homes only thirty-five short years ago. They will witness a lesson in the use of forbearance and generosity which it is to be hoped will not be lost upon those who have to meet the Native Problem in the troubled times that lie ahead of us in South Africa.

So, like to the proverbial Kotukurerenga-tahi, the rare white crane of Maori legend, whose flight is seen but once and no more in the span of one's life, our Royal visitors come and go bearing great messages and leaving a lasting memory and influence behind them.

William Jellie.

Auckland, June 14.

A letter from the Rev. J. C. Woods, formerly minister of the Unitarian church in Adelaide, South Australia, brings us the pleasant tidings that a new chancel has been built to the church, at a cost of about £500, the gift of Mr. Alfred M. Simpson, and that a new organ has been erected, costing about £600. Both chancel and organ were opened on Friday evening June 7, when Mr. E. Kay, Chairman of the Committee, gave a sketch of the history of the church from its inception 48 years ago. It was gratifying to the congregation to know that with respect to both acquisitions the church was free from debt.

THE EDUCATION BILL—PAST OR FUTURE.

Sir,—My valued friend, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, has, in his last interesting communication, championed the School Boards wih all his customary ability and zeal. He seems to consider their possible supersession by municipal councils as the destruction of all hopes of improvement in educational methods. He regards "the School Board as the citadel singled out for attack by the reactionists," and thinks that "it is a fort to be held at all hazards." May I offer a few reasons which disable me from sharing in his admiration for the "citadel," or from dreading its possible downfall.

The substitution of a new form of educational machinery for the School Boards can in no true sense involve the "degradation" of the latter; nor can I discern "the grave injustice," or a "serious indignity," or "a public scandal if they were sent about their business." I have never regarded them in the light of a counsel of perfection. They were vitiated at the outset by the cumulative vote, which seemed ingeniously contrived to secure the representation of every variety of sectarian interests. In consequence, there has never ceased to be an internecine strife between denominationalist and unsectarian—the former persistently striving to keep down the erection of additional schools, lest they should prove formidable rivals, and carry away custom, so to speak, from the so-called voluntary schools. With characteristic courage Mr. Dowson has recently engaged in controversy with, perhaps, one of the most redoubtable clerical champions of the latter in the country, who, a few years ago, succeeded in carrying a majority of Churchmen on the Manchester Board, and thus placed him in the important and influential position of its Chairman. Nor, conscientiously enough, did he lose the opportunity, for the time being, of "dishing" his opponents. He furnished a striking example of the truth that the clergy always look primarily to the interests of their special organisations. Presumably elected to promote popular education, for its own sake, they seek first the protection of their own property. At every recurring election, it is notorious that the Catholic priest calls together his flock, and subjects them to a careful drill as to the persons for whom they are to vote; and a similar proceeding is not unknown in the Established Church. Against these powerful influences the friends of education—apart from creeds and dogmas—are compelled to canvass hard and long, to hold numerous meetings, and to raise a considerable fund—almost on the scale of a Parliamentary election—with a probable result of finding their representatives in a minority on the Board.

I hold to my previous statement, that the School Boards have been, from the first, infested with the virus of sectarianism. What is the reason? It is that clericals were not excluded from them, as they are from municipal bodies and from the House of Commons. History proclaims in characters of light that the priest has ever been a fruitful source of evil in a thousand ways. Has the presence of the bishops in the House of Lords ever rendered legislation more favourable to liberty of conscience, to the extension of political rights, to the moral progress of the nation? Did they do much to mitigate the terrors of the criminal code? Were they the first advocates of the abolition of slavery? So I contend that the presence of the clerical element in School Boards has been a hindrance to their work, a bar to progress, a source of weakness and antagonisms.

I am, therefore, entirely unable to sympathise with my friend in the adulation which he lavishes on these bodies. I believe that if they consisted of laymen only they would have pursued a more liberal policy, and that the interests of education, and not those of the sects, would have enjoyed the first consideration. Hence I look forward with confidence to the transfer of educational work and responsibilities from the School Boards to the County and County Borough Councils, which is destined, ere long, to take place.

DUTCH REFORMED MINISTERS.

SIR,—May I be allowed in your columns a few lines with reference to a remark in Professor Eerdmans' paper, published in your yesterday's issue? After declaring that he and his friends do not intend to give up their position in the Dutch Church, because it enables them to influence in a liberal direction the more simple-minded people who hold to this Church, the author says: "It is a pity that some of our energetic young liberal ministers take little interest in these things," and expresses the regret that some of them, under Tolstoy's influence, have taken to communistic agriculture. Happening to be personally acquainted with this particular case, I feel that Mr. Eerdmans has, doubtless quite unintentionally, somewhat misrepresented the conduct of the young ministers in question. Far from taking "little interest in these things," they have acted as they have precisely because they did take an interest in them, and, in my humble opinion, unusually deep and discerning interest. Their motives were similar to those which have led many representatives of the Established Church in this country to abandon their position, and which are, in the same issue of your paper, expressed with such admirable terseness by Mr. R. A. Armstrong in his statement that, with regard to the ethics of subscription and conformity, Dr. Martineau "declines to admit the plea for leave to depart from the formula of the Church while still in enjoyment of its offices."

Practically, the position these ex-ministers of the Dutch Church now occupy, although entered into by them rather for the purpose of leading what they consider a more honest and natural life, than for that of propaganda, nevertheless furnishes them also with better opportunities of influencing others for good, in the right place, at the right time, and, above all, by right means. I do not for a moment desire to question Mr. Eerdmans' right of using his own discretion in this matter so far as he is himself concerned. But I do feel that, whatever our views, we should endeavour to be as broad-minded, fair and tolerant as possible in relation to those whose spiritual development leads them to issues different from the course we have ourselves adopted. It is quite natural that Mr. Eerdmans and his friends, from their point of view, should, as he himself confesses, like to have the energy of those retired ministers still working for the profit of the Dutch Reformed Church; but the fact should not be overlooked that in the sphere of conscience and conscientious scruples, as distinguished from mere proselytising, the greater the energy available the more independent are the channels it inevitably works out for its realisation.

UNITARIAN VISITORS TO GLASGOW.

SIR,—I fear that some Unitarian friends from the South may have suffered disappointment in seeking to avail themselves of the assistance we offer through our advertisement in your columns. Last week several visitors called on both Mr. Collins and myself, and found us from home. May I ask those of your readers who propose to visit Glasgow, and wish to be assisted in securing lodgings, to give us one or two days notice of their intention? By doing so they will avoid the risk of missing us, and the more serious risk of having to pay preposterous prices for rooms, or of failing to get accommodation at all.

JAMES FORREST.

"INTER AMICOS."

SIR,—Mr. Armstrong's valuable review will doubtless send many of your readers to the perusal of this most interesting correspondence.

From the extracts given, it is indeed abundantly clear that Dr. Martineau at no time held the orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation, involving as this does the deity of Christ; nevertheless, that a teacher who gave it as his mature conviction that in Christ God was personally there, "has not left it at all doubtful that he clearly recognised the truth and far-reaching influence of this conception"—namely, the conception of "God's Incarnation in all souls, and par excellence in Jesus," was irrefutably and most usefully set forth in your columns (Dec. 8, 1900) by Professor Upton, in his masterly defence of Dr. Martineau against the criticisms of Principal Forsyth.

J. WARSCHAUER.

WALTHAMSTOW.

SIR,—Will you allow me to make an earnest and urgent appeal to friends in connection with our London churches on behalf of our Sunday-school at Walthamstow. There is a very pressing need for a gentleman as superintendent, and for two teachers in the afternoon. Through removals from the neighbourhood, the school has lately suffered the loss of a superintendent and teachers, and at present their vacant positions cannot be filled locally. With an average attendance of sixty to seventy children, and not one male teacher, and only three or four ladies who are doing their best to carry on the school, there is scarcely any need for me to say that they feel themselves unequal to the task. Very reluctantly it has been decided to close the school during August, because the small teaching staff will be still further reduced by the effects of the holiday season. The school will be opened in September, when it is hoped that some friends of the children will volunteer to help in this good work among the young, or the alternative will have to be faced of closing the school entirely, which will not reflect credit on the London Liberal churches.

T. E. M. EDWARDS,
Minister in Charge.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

Bermondsey School Excursion.—The Rev. W. G. Tarrant (4, Geraldine-road, Wandsworth) begs to acknowledge with thanks donations to this fund as follows:—G. L. B., 12s.; G. C., 10s.; G. W. C., 10s.; H. E., £1; J. H., £1 1s.; and Mrs. T. (Streatham), 10s.; total, £4 3s. As the expenses are estimated at about £10, a few more donations would be gratefully appreciated. The Band of Hope excursion to Southend was successfully held on the 17th. The officers tender their thanks to the following friends who generously contributed towards the cost:—Mr. Edwin Ellis, Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, Miss A. J. Lawrence, Mr. F. Nettlefold, Mr. J. F. Schwann, and Miss C. Sharpe.

School Treats.

We have reports of pleasant summer treats from Chichester, Crumlin, and Stannington, and also from the Avondale Band of Hope, Peckham.

Bury St. Edmunds.—On Sunday, July 14, the service was conducted by the Rev. C. A. Greaves, who was staying in the town; on July 21 by Mr. E. Palmer. At the school treat on Thursday week, held at the village of Bardwell, a pleasant incident occurred, when after tea the Primitive Methodists, who were holding their treat close by, invited the school to join in their sports, an invitation which, needless to say, was cordially accepted.

London: Essex Church.—Renovation and electric lighting will necessitate the discontinuance of the services during August and part of September. The church will be reopened on Sunday, Sept. 22.

London: Stratford.—The annual picnic of the Young People's Guild was held on Saturday, July 20, at Chingford, at which twenty-three were present.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The congregation have erected two brass memorial tablets, to the late John Shackleton Mathers, J.P., "who by a lifelong devotion to this church endeared his memory to the hearts of his fellow-labourers," and the late William Westerman, "A faithful son and loyal servant of our Household of Faith." The tablets were dedicated on Sunday evening, when a special sermon was preached by the Rev. C. Harvey Cook.

Mossley.—At the morning service on Sunday in the Christian Church, the Rev. T. R. Elliott made reference to the loss sustained by the congregation in the death of Mr. George Mills, J.P., one of the oldest borough magistrates, and for many years a respected member of the council. Mr. Mills, who was sixty-eight years of age, was an active worker and generous supporter of the Christian Church.

Newark-on-Trent.—On Sunday, 14th inst., the annual flower services were held at the Free Christian Church, King's-road, when the special preacher was the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Nottingham. The interior of the building had been profusely decorated with flowers and foliage, and looked exceedingly well. Thanks are due to Mr. C. Smith, of Normanton, who gave a quantity of roses. The anthems "Thine O Lord," and "I will extol Thee," were sung by the choir. The evening congregation was much above the average, and Mr. Lindsay preached an eloquent sermon from the words "For in Him we live and move and have our being; as certain of your own poets have said: For we are also His offspring."—Acts xvii. 28.

Padiham.—A correspondent writes:—"Many outside friends will join with us in our sorrow at the death of Mrs. Andrew Wilkinson, on Monday last. She was a zealous and untiring supporter of the chapel, and vitally interested in its welfare in the highest sense. During her long illness she never failed to attend the services and meetings whenever a temporary improvement allowed her to leave the house. Her sick room always seemed so full of the light of her bright presence, that it was hard for us to believe we were dependent upon her frail body for all earthly intercourse with her; and now that death has separated us from herself, we shall always cherish her memory with gratitude and affection."

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Rev. James Ewart Jenkins, late of Dowlais, Glamorganshire, commenced his work as assistant minister at Upper Chapel on Sunday last.

Ministers shall be insured in the Equitable Life Insurance Society for yearly pensions of £52 (or double pensions of £104) on attaining the age of sixty-five years, with or without the sum of £250 at death. The income of the Fund shall be applied to pay half the necessary premiums, but if the premium exceed £20 the Fund shall not contribute more than £10. All Ministers who are Members of the Conference shall be eligible for benefit, subject to the right of the Managers to select those whom they shall deem most fitting, should the income of the Fund prove at any time insufficient to assist all candidates for insurance.

A capital sum of £20,000 and a yearly income of £300 in subscriptions are required to meet the needs of insurers at the outset, and provide for the gradual increase in their number during the first ten or fifteen years.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"THIS is the holiday season of the year. We all need rest and change and quietness. We are in the power of conventions far too much in our town life through the year. Let us see to it that convention does not spoil the few precious days or weeks which we have for change and recreation. Convention would take us from a city of work to a city of pleasure; it would land us amidst enormous crowds at some popular seaside resort, where men do their best to distract attention from the sea and sky by noisy amusements and vulgar excitements. We need for a little time to feel 'the peace at the heart of nature,' we want to feel the beauty of the world, the simplicity of country life. There are crowds enough at home. Let us work cheerfully amongst them here and feel the privilege of human fellowship, the happiness of giving and receiving help. We shall return to such a life with larger heart and hope, if we go away for a little, alone or with our best friends amongst the mountains or beside the sea. There are still in England thousands of quiet places where we can live in simplicity, where peace and beauty reign, and whence we may return, not only strengthened in body, but purified and ennobled in spirit through communion with God in the world which He has made." To this note from the August number of the Leicester Great Meeting and Free Christian Church Messenger we say, would that it might be so with all of us!

OF the other Iceland articles referred to by Mr. Armstrong in his holiday letter last week, one appears in Thursday's Christian World, and contains some vivid notes as to the island and its people. At Reykjavik, it seems, a vigorous Catholic movement has been established, and the Salvation Army has mustered a hundred members, while there is another little band at Akureyri. The Army Mr. Armstrong thinks more likely to succeed in Iceland than the Roman mission. Of the Temperance movement, which shows abundant life, Orafia Johansdöttir, who will be known to many workers in this country, is the life and soul. Of how she welcomed Mr. Armstrong, the following passage tells :—

I had made her acquaintance some years since in Liverpool, and she and her noble old aunt, Thorbjörg Svensdöttir, sister of the late leader of the Radical party, Benedik Svensson, gave us right royal welcome, including a dish of "skue," a preparation of whey of national renown. She begged me to address a Temperance meeting to be got up on the spur of the moment. It was a pouring night, and no announcements had been given but mouth to mouth and hand to hand notices from friend to friend. But the Artisan's hall was packed with 300 people, out of a population of 5,000. The Speaker was there, and the Leader of the House, and the Bank Director, and other big folk, and the shopkeepers, and a hundred or two of fish-wives, fair and sturdy women, worthy daughters of the Sagamen. I spoke in such Norwegian as I could muster, having no Icelandic, and I am told that these humble people understood me well. Then we had some truly wonderful choral singing by a choir of thirty members from the Y.M.C.A. (though half of them were girls) trained entirely last winter by a rising young musician who afterwards gave us some remarkable renderings of Chopin and others. The forms and faces of two or three of these earnest young souls, as with perfect precision they responded to the conductor's wand now in slow and melancholy cadence, now with a shout of joy, are imprinted on my memory for the rest of my life. I like to think of the spirit of their music in the dreary night that settles on their land in the winter-tide.

Of the Icelanders, with their gentle kindness to their ponies, and their frank courtesy to one another as well as to their visitors, Mr. Armstrong gives a delightful impression.

ANOTHER great bishop has been taken from the Church of England by the death last Saturday of Dr. Westcott, of Durham. London, Oxford, and Durham at intervals of hardly more than three months have suffered this great loss, and in each case it is not the Church alone that has been the poorer, but the nation and the world of scholarship. Brooke Foss Westcott was a native of Birmingham, where he was born in 1825, and he was at King Edward's school with Benson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lightfoot, whom in 1890 he succeeded as Bishop of Durham. He had a brilliant career at Cambridge, and then for seventeen years was a master at Harrow, during which time he published his well-known "History of the New Testament Canon," his "Introduction to the Study of the Gospels," and other works. In 1870 he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and eleven years later, as the result of years of patient labour, with his friend Dr. Hort, published an edition of the Greek Testament. His commentary on the Fourth Gospel and the Epistles of St. John and to the Hebrews rank with the great works of Lightfoot. He was successively Canon of Peterborough and Westminster, where as a preacher he had profound influence, before his appointment to the see of Durham. As in scholarship, so as bishop he was equal to the high tradition left by his predecessor. From the old Chartist days he had a keen interest in social questions, and he was an idealist who know how to deal with both facts and men. His settlement of the great coal strike in 1892 was a triumph of insight and genuine sympathy. As to his churchmanship the memorial notice in the Times said :

The bishop's intense and concentrated reverence saved him at once from the occasional slovenliness of the Evangelical, and from the vain repetitions of the very high Churchman. For the rest he looked so deeply into the truths which go to the making of spiritual religion, that he rarely opened his lips as to the questions of externals, which are the casus belli of most ecclesiastical controversies.

"He lived simply and reverently," says the Guardian, "in the presence of the great truths he taught, a man of strong faith, humble piety, noble ideals, strenuous endeavour, and complete unworldliness—a truly Apostolic man."

IT is with the sincerest regret that we record the death last Sunday of Mr. James Greville Clarke, head of the firm of James Clarke and Co. and Editor of the Christian World. Born in 1854, he went to Christ's College, Cambridge, and after graduation joined his father, who was the founder of the Christian World, in Fleet-street. On the death of the latter in 1888, he succeeded to the chief editorship, and with his brothers carried on the extensive business of the firm. He seems to have been an ideal editor, and we have read with the utmost sympathy the tributes to his memory in this week's Christian World. Mr. S. R. Crockett writes a warm and affectionate tribute, and a leading article has the following passage :—

He was the very embodiment of courtesy. The sense of what he owed, not only to the rights but to the inmost feelings of others, was never absent, and seemed to accentuate itself where the person dealt with was of humble condition. The fierce attacks to which the editor of a religious journal conducted on liberal lines is ever exposed never disturbed his equanimity. Having satisfied his own instinct for righteousness, he accepted adverse criticism, amounting often to personal vituperation, as in the day's work and passed quietly on to the next duty. In this he followed the editorial traditions he had received. The policy of his revered father, of a frank acceptance of new truth from whatever quarter, of securing a hearing for serious thinking of widely divergent schools, of fighting oppression and championing deserving causes however weak and unpopular, was faithfully carried out by the son. He strove to make the paper a pioneer of progress, not only in religious thinking, but also in religious being and doing.

We have often been grateful to the Christian World for its courage and genuine liberality, and cannot now be unmindful of the sorrow, which all who have a share in that great enterprise must feel.

The recent death of Signor Piatti, who was close upon eighty years of age, must have recalled many delightful memories of the Popular Concerts in St. James's Hall, where for thirty-seven years, from the commencement of the concerts in 1859 he was the violoncellist. A native of Bergamo, where he was born in 1822, Piatti first appeared in London at a Philharmonic Concert, in 1844, when Mendelssohn was also among the performers. In that same year Joachim came to London for the first time, with whom Piatti was afterwards so long and so closely associated. Never were artists more truly matched, in the noble simplicity of their lives, their whole-hearted love of music, their genuine modesty and devotion to their art. A brief notice of Piatti in the Athenæum spoke of what was most attractive in his personality:—

> Piatti lived a quiet, uneventful life; he was simple in his habits, and modest in manner. As performer on his instrument he was remarkable for the wonderful charm and purity of his tone, for his admirably finished technique, and for the intelligent and able renderings which he gave of music by the great masters.

Such an artist is to be gratefully remembered, who in his own sphere did so much to help to make "the gladness of the world."

The exhibition of Spanish pictures at the Guildhall has been so highly appreciated, that instead of closing on July 31, which is the usual date, the authorities announce that it will remain open until Wednesday, August 28. It is the tenth Loan Exhibition held at the Guildhall, of which the exhibition of Dutch and British pictures in 1894 was visited by 300,366 persons. Last year's exhibition of the works of living British painters was visited by 201,456 persons. The attendance at the present exhibition has varied from 2,000 to 4,000 on week-days. Last Sunday afternoon there were 784 visitors, and the total up to that date was 248,420. One of the rooms is devoted to the work of Velazquez, powerful and interesting, but not particularly attractive. There are several great Murillos, the most striking of all being No. 88, "Our Lady of Sorrows." Of other artists, the portraits by Goya, the work of José Gallegos, and Pradilla's great historical pictures seem specially noticeable.

It is announced that the three volumes of supplement to the great Dictionary of National Biography will be published next month. These volumes will make good some omissions in the original work, but their chief purpose is to furnish biographies of those who have died since the successive volumes (sixty-three in all) appeared. It was at first intended that the supplement should only deal with lives concluded within the last century, but a biography of Queen Victoria (by Mr. Sidney Lee) is very fitly included, and the Supplement is to be no less fitly prefaced by a biography of Mr. George Smith, to whose enthusiasm and public spirit the publication of the Dictionary was due. Among the biographies in the new volumes are Matthew Arnold, by Dr. Richard Garnett; Browning, by Mr. Edmund Gosse; Burne-Jones, by Mr. T. Humphry Ward; Gladstone, by Mr. Herbert Paul; Huxley, by Professor Weldon; Jowett, by Dr. Evelyn Abbott; and Martineau, by the Rev. Alexander Gordon. John Bright, Randolph Churchill, Lord Coleridge, Bishop Creighton, Freeman, Froude, Lord Herschell, Lord Leighton, Liddell, Max Müller, Millais, William Morris, Ruskin, Sidgwick, and Sullivan, are also among the chief of the names included.

A writer in the Daily News, who contributes notes "Among the Churches," over the signature "P. W. W.," had something to say on Friday week about two books recently issued from Essex Hall, the collection of the late John Wright's two series of tracts, "Denials and Beliefs of Unitarians," and the Rev. R. T. Herford's little volume of "Unitarian Affirmations." The critic expressed a preference for Mr. Herford's book, but drew what we take to be a quite unjustifiable inference from a quotation from Stopford Brooke prefixed to Mr. Wright's. The choice between "life and death, light and darkness, truth and lies" must appeal directly to every man of earnest moral life, and in the search for theological truth and the endeavour lafter truthfulness of religious life, no ess than in any other sphere. But this by no means implies intolerance towards other men's honest beliefs or an unwillingness to see the truth that may be at the heart of their faith. It simply means that a man must be honest with himself, and when he sees truth must resolutely hold to it, and live up to it, to the full measure of his insight and capacity.

Mr. Herford's critic is inclined to think his treatment of the Bible "not quite accurate." We are inclined, on the other hand, to think the critic not very discerning; but his criticism on this point is hardly precise enough to be worth dealing with. "P. W. W.," however, writes as "a secular journalist," and is not really interested in the question as to Unity or Trinity; what he wants to know is whether a Unitarian can convert or redeem a confirmed drunkard. On this the Rev. F. Summers very properly wrote to call his attention to the work of the London Domestic Mission, and if "P. W. W." wants a "test mission" he has only to inquire into the quiet work which has been done during the last sixty years by such missions, not only in London, but in Manchester, Liverpool, Bristol, Birmingham, and other great towns, to see how devoted men, single-hearted followers of Jesus, and absolutely Unitarian, as he was, in their thought of God, have lifted up the fallen, and delivered the drunkard from his degrading vice. They do not boast of the "conversions" they have effected; but the lives of the people in their district bear witness to the redeeming influence of their lives. We should say that it is the power of absolutely unselfish love that does the redeeming work. In the Evangelical it works as the power of Christ the Saviour, possessing the believer's life; in the Unitarian it is the direct appeal of the Father (as in the Parable of the Prodigal) speaking out of a brother's heart. How far Unitarians give themselves to such devoted service is another matter, but that they have the power cannot justly be questioned.

The work of the Manchester Sunday School Association Holiday Home at Great Hucklow was described last week in Der Protestant, a liberal religious journal, published in Berlin. The article closes with the wish that some such work might be done in Germany also. "It need not be in distant mountain country. Only a little way out of town!" The great thing is to take the children into genuine country, away from the oppression of the crowded streets and stifling rooms, into the sun-light and fresh air.

Of Professor Harnack's "Wesen des Christentums" (published by Hinrichs, of Leipsic, for 3s. 6d.), 25,000 copies have been issued. Would that a cheap edition of the English translation, "What is Christianity?" could have a like circulation in this country!

The Rev. Emile Roberty, a venerable Protestant pastor at Rouen, and father of the Rev. J. E. Roberty, of Paris, recently celebrated his Jubilee of ministerial service. His present charge at Rouen he has held since 1859, when he succeeded the Rev. M. Paumier, who had been settled there since 1816. The Rev. M. Mordant, M. Paumier's predecessor, had been at Rouen since 1770, so that these three pastorates have covered together 131 years.

THE RELIGIOUS CRISIS OF OUR AGE.

BY PROFESSOR OTTO PFLEIDERER, OF BERLIN.*

It is an acknowledged fact, that the Christian religion is at present involved in a crisis which appears to be of graver nature, both in scope and in character, than any previous conflict. In scope, because it is no longer confined to the upper classes, but has seized hold of the great masses; and in character, because doubt and contradiction have passed beyond the outworks of hierarchical abuses and patristic or scholastic dogmas, and have attacked the very foundations of religious belief. But, as history teaches that Christianity has already issued from many a struggle not only victorious, but also purified and invigorated, we are justified in the hope that the present crisis will finally enable the religious spirit, set free from ancient bonds, to realise with greater freedom, energy, and purity, its indestructible life. The more impartially we contemplate the present difficulty, the more clearly we endeavour to recognise its causes, the more convinced shall we be that the very circumstances and tendencies of thought which are responsible for the evil, implicitly contain the forces of resistance and of cure, which will bring to light, with the aid of the Christian spirit, a new development alike of religion and of the moral life in human society.

The religious crisis of to-day rests on a combination of new scientific modes of thought with new social ideals, such as has never presented itself before. The former are summed up in the idea of evolution, which became dominant after Darwin, in the field of natural science, and was then applied by Marx to history also, with the intention of eliminating from it all ideal aims and motives, and reducing everything to the struggle of material interests. By this means the dea of evolution, which still in Herder and Hegel served to support an idealistic teleological interpretation of history, was now employed as the foundation of that practical materialism which, in social democratic circles, has taken the place of the religious view of the world. This view is now opposed by a combination of the practically Socialist tendency with the scientific modes of thought belonging to our time. In this conflict lies the difficulty of the present situation. How can we meet it? What can we do to preserve religion for our children and grandchildren, and to heal the breach which seems to have been formed with such incurable mischief between the ineradicable religious needs of the human heart and man's modern thought?

The Facts must be Faced.

Thus much, at any rate, is certain—that nothing could be more perverse, nothing more futile, than the renewed attempt of short-sighted and narrow-minded men to suppress the scientific thought of the present day, or, at any rate, wherever it comes into collision with traditional ecclesiastical doctrines, to deny it all justification, and exclude it from popular instruction. Nowadays, when in all civilised countries the school and the Press vie with each other in popularising and diffusing the scientific results of astronomy, geology, biology, anthropology, and sociology, it is impossible to prevent the simple man of the people from comparing these results with the Biblical-ecclesiastical traditions of the creation of the world in six days, or of the primeval paradisal condition of humanity, and convincing himself that they are no longer tenable.

. . . . .

Happy Issue of an Earlier Crisis.

When the Copernican was substituted for the Ptolemaic astronomy, the theologians of the sixteenth century condemned the innovation as a soul-destroying error. The heliocentric theory was fatal to the naïve representation of the intercourse of man with God and exalted spirits. The earth was no more a fixed disc beneath the vault of heaven above, with hell yawning in the deep beneath. What, then, became of the upper dwelling of the blessed souls, and of the place of doom for the condemned? There was no place for the heaven from which Christ came down, the hell into which he descended, or the seat at God's right hand to which he went up through the sky, and from which he should return to judge the earth. The whole traditional scheme of redemption fell to pieces, with the overthrow of the pre-Copernican universe. Yet Kepler and Newton showed that the knowledge of the laws of the universe, so far from being a hindrance to faith, only deepened their reverence for the power and wisdom of the Creator. The master of philosophical criticism, Kant, testified in like manner that there are two things which ever awake our pious awe—the starry heaven above us, and the moral law within. Both were to him the revelations of an Almighty Divine Power, which established and sustained the order alike of the natural and of the moral worlds. Modern astronomy has thus replaced the primitive conception by something better. In showing that the heavenly bodies move according to law, it has confirmed us in the conviction that "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." Of this theme the story of the creation supplies the poetic illustration. In this lies its ideal significance, which no science can set aside.

True Meaning of Evolution.

The same is true of the other stone of stumbling, the Darwinian doctrine of Evolution, when applied to the origin of man. When biology presents man as the final fruit of a long development from a primitive cell, it indisputably satisfies the understanding with its search for causes far better than the childish representation that God had moulded the human frame out of a clod, and blown into it the breath of life. Nothing prevents us from seeing in this representation with many early Church teachers, such as Origen, a mere symbol of the truth that, while man's corporeal life is derived from the earth, his spirit comes from God, and is kin with Him. Does this union and relationship with the being of God, felt more or less clearly by mankind at large—we might call it the general and natural consciousness of Divine humanity—really stand in conflict with the scientific doctrine of Evolution? This would only be the case if the development of man's physical nature were conceived solely as a mechanically materialistic process, excluding all ideal and teleological principles. But so one-sided a theory, though it finds favour in many quarters, is not only not required by science, it even contradicts prudent scientific thought. Investigators who accept the doctrine of Evolution in principle, have admitted that mere causal mechanism does not suffice to explain the rise of life in general, or of mind in particular. A spiritual principle is needed besides, whose purposes are carried out by the causal process as the means. This presupposition does not, indeed, permit of experimental proof, and may be consequently rejected; but science has no right to deny it. To do so, would be an unwarrantable transgression of the limits imposed on the world of phenomena. No science, therefore, can prevent us from regarding the life of the earth as a process in which the chain of causes and effects is only one side of a teleology controlling the whole, such as Kant declared in the most emphatic terms to be indispensable for the knowledge of Nature. But, in that case, its actual issue, the production of spiritual life in man, must be regarded also as its initial aim—which is only possible on the assumption of a purposive creative reason. Thus understood, the doctrine of Evolution, far from being hostile to religious convictions, serves much rather to confirm it. Man has his origin in the creative mind of God, who has not, indeed, produced him so immediately as in the Biblical story; but has brought him forth as the crown of the rest of creation, by the instrumentality of its entire development. The origin of man is then conceived no more as an abrupt act of miracle; it is regarded as, indeed, based on Divine power and wisdom, but as accomplished by means of natural causes through a long process of time.

The Ascent of Man.

Is this difference significant enough to make it worth while to prolong the quarrel between Theology and Science? What does it matter whether God created man out of an inorganic clod or out of a primitive cell destined to develop into a thousand forms of life? Whether he produced him in a single day or in the millenniums before the human race first appeared on earth? It would be of small consequence, it is replied, if there were no further issues. But the Biblical tradition presents man as created perfect, in the likeness of God, and fallen from this elevation by his own fault; while the theory of Evolution exhibits him as issuing from the lowest animal conditions, and only rising amid prolonged and severe struggle for existence to higher stages of human civilisation. The whole course of history is thus reversed. Dogma declared man fallen, guilt-laden, needing atonement; and finally restored only by the fresh miracles of redemption. In his place appears the man of actual history, striving upwards, freeing himself by labour, sacrifices, and suffering of every kind, from the early bonds of a coarse nature, and thus attaining his likeness to God. The former beginning is now the goal. A vanished Eden in the past has become the ideal of Hope, towards which we may for ever aspire. This difference is certainly not to be under-estimated; but who would assert that what we lose by this exchange is worth more than that which we obtain? Who will not rather thankfully recognise that here science exerts on our moral and religious thought a liberating influence?

* A Paper read (by the President) to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, at Essex Hall, on Friday morning, May 31. The length of Professor Pfleiderer's paper has obliged us to make some omissions, as indicated in the text. The paper will appear in full in the forthcoming volume of the Proceedings of the International Council.

Jesus knew nothing of the curse of the Fall, or of the burden of hereditary guilt. He did not treat the little children as lost or condemned for Adam's sake. On the contrary, he declared that "theirs is the kingdom of heaven," and regarded likeness to God not as a lost primeval possession, but as a goal to be achieved by moral endeavour. And so he stands entirely on the side of modern Evolutionism and optimism.

Something better than "Miracle."

Another important step has been taken by the religious consciousness with the aid of modern science. It is the axiom of physical science that every event in space and time stands under the absolute sovereignty of the law of causation. The chain of cause and effect, therefore, can never be interrupted by supernatural acts or "miracles."

. . . . .

The teachers of religion ought to recognise this fact frankly, and be grateful to science for relieving them of the laborious and unfruitful task of defending the historical reality of naïve legends—a task which will seem as strange to future generations as it would seem absurd to-day for an admirer of Homer to feel bound to defend the stories of the gods and heroes as genuine history. Besides their poetic charm, however, the Biblical legends further possess the higher value of symbols, which express in picturesque and generally intelligible form the ideal truths and spiritual experiences of the early Christian community. As the religious teachers of to-day succeed more and more in setting forth this ideal meaning of the Biblical narratives, less and less importance will be attached to their literal truth. We shall cease to dispute about the supernatural miracles of antiquity; in the daily course of nature we shall learn to adore the "wonders" of divine power and wisdom, and in the significant events both of history and of our own lives we shall recognise the signs of a ruling Providence to whose guidance we can commit ourselves in humility and trust. In this field also the seeming loss will finally prove itself real again. Instead of a few doubtful miracles in a distant past, the pious mind will find the actual world and the life of the present everywhere and always full of marvels, of events without and within us revealing the wisdom, justice, and goodness of God as He rules the world and educates humanity. That was the meaning of Jesus when he condemned the craving for signs among his contemporaries, and urged them rather to understand the signs of the times. In the power of his word over the hearts of men they would find a sign and a call to repentance such as the men of Nineveh had recognised in the preaching of Jonah (Matt. xvi. 2—4; Luke xi. 29). From the magical wonders of the world of sense, Jesus thus pointed his countrymen to the spiritual and moral wonders of the inner life. These collide against no science, for they do not belong to the external sphere with which science is alone concerned. So far as modern science enables the religious consciousness to return into its own field of the spirit, we ought to reckon the present crisis as a step towards final victory. It will help to eliminate the unspiritual elements of traditional Christianity, and bring into clearer view as its real essence the religion of spirit and of truth.

Providence in History.

But now religion appears to be threatened with a new and graver peril from the science of history. The doctrine of development has resulted for many minds in a mechanically materialist interpretation of the course of history, which rejects all ideal forces, all personal spiritual life, all lofty ideas and heroic deeds, as decisive factors of progress, and recognises as effective causes only the condition of the masses, their physical needs and social endeavours. Not even the history of religion is allowed to constitute any exception. Instead of a revelation of eternal truths by prophets impelled by the Divine Spirit, religious movements must be universally regarded as the reflex and effect of the conditions of national culture and economic necessities.

No one will deny that the appearance of Jesus Christ was only possible within the Jewish nation where the way had been prepared by the prophets, and that his career could only produce lasting results when "the time was fulfilled," when—that is to say—under the terrible pressure of political and social need the hopes and yearnings of the people for the advent of the Messianic salvation had reached their utmost intensity. But however important this may be, it would be an error to conclude that the misery of the Jews of that age afforded a sufficient explanation for the person of Jesus, and for the origin of Christianity. That misery was shared by all, and all called for deliverance, but only one was able to bring it and become a saviour, Jesus of Nazareth. Do we ask why? The answer in the age of evolution cannot differ essentially from that already given by the evangelists, Jesus was the redeemer because he was chosen by God and anointed with spirit and power. Whether in religious or secular history, it is only the inborn genius, this mysterious divine power in a man, whose ultimate source lies in the Father of spirits, which can solve the problems of its time and achieve the salvation of all. The mass never contains the productive power for this, only the demand for it, and the susceptibility to it. Outward circumstances may awaken the slumbering energy of the individual genius, and prepare the proper paths for its action; but they can no more generate its force than the cylinder of the steam-engine can beget the driving power of the steam. Of the significance of this peculiar force of personality all ages have shown an instinctive consciousness. Hero-worship, which admires in the hero a gift of Deity and joyously obeys his authority, lies deep in human nature, and even in our democratic age constantly breaks through all paralogisms of the understanding with elemental might. The higher any personality stands in moral worth, and the wider the range of its activity, the stronger in its attractive power on the hearts of men, so that they are bound to it in reverence and admiration, in confidence and love.

The Commanding Influence of Jesus.

This is above all true of the person of Jesus Christ, according to the testimony not only of the faithful Christians of all ages, but also of many of those among our contemporaries who otherwise boast of their emancipation from Church and Christianity. Among the working classes one of the most noteworthy features is the sympathy and reverence shown even by radicals for the person of Jesus. Little as they wish to know of the Christ of dogma, their interest is vital in the Jesus of history; and if they see in him pre-eminently the friend of the poor and the powerful opponent of the ruling classes, this conception, which is intelligible from their point of view, may be called perhaps one-sided, but certainly not unfair; nay, it must be admitted that it realises an important aspect of the Gospel figure too little regarded by ecclesiastical theology. And this correction leads to the important inference that Christianity is not rightly apprehended in the meaning of its founder when its message of salvation is referred only to the blessedness of heaven hereafter, or even to a mystical redemption and tranquillity of soul in this life for the individual, while its obvious intention to renew and transform the social life of the world is overlooked or placed in the background. It is the most certain result of the criticism of the Gospels that the early Church and, still earlier, Jesus himself, hoped for the appearance of the kingdom of God upon earth. This oldest form of Christian faith was afterwards rejected by theology under the name of Chiliasm as Jewish error. To hold fast the essence of its social ethics, while divesting it of its apocalyptic supernaturalism, and to take in hand its realisation by persistent work in church and society—this is the task of the present to which historical science and practical life both point the way. To this ethicising of Christianity will correspond the Christianising of ethics and politics.

The True Social Ideal.

If the Socialists revere in Jesus first and foremost only the friend of the people, further penetration into the Gospel story will soon convince them that his saving love for the poor, the sick, and the sinner, was far removed from moral indifferentism. A holy earnestness and zeal against sin glowed through it. As the condition of entrance into the blessedness of the kingdom of God he demanded the moral renewal of the character, struggle against sensual desires, hunger after righteousness, the doing of the will of the Father in heaven. He did not believe that the salvation of a people was founded on external circumstances; he knew that most of all depended on the hearts of men; and so he began his saving work with the summons to repentance and the moral and religious education of individuals by his word and example. Should not that be an inspiring example for the friends of the people to-day? Even the politicians might learn of Jesus that the kingdom of God does not, like the kingdoms of this world, rest upon force and selfish lust of power; and its advent is not promoted by bloody wars in the name of the Cross, or even of humanity and civilisation, by the devastation of countries, and the crushing of nations. When the disciples of Jesus in their typical missionary zeal wished to call down fire from heaven upon a hostile village, the Lord asked them, "Know ye not of what spirit ye are?" (Luke ix. 55). And when on another occasion they disputed about precedence in the kingdom of heaven, he said to them, "They which are accounted to rule over the Gentiles lord it over them; and their great ones exercise authority over them. But it is not so among you; but whosoever would be great among you shall be your minister, and whosoever would be the first among you shall be servant of all" (Mark x. 42-3). That is a maxim from which the reality of political life will long be far removed. But it assuredly contains the ideal to which we must for ever approach, if we are in earnest about the coming of the kingdom of God upon earth.

The Hope of the Future.

The signs of the times, therefore, and the present religious crisis, thus point to one result. Christianity must be relieved of its traditional dogmatic bonds, so as to enable its ethical leavening power to advance with greater freedom and might for the welfare not only of individual souls, but also of social life as a whole. The present crisis is one of the most important stages in the development of Christianity. The spirits of the age, which seem to threaten its very existence, science, politics social and international, must be brought into the service of one end, the liberation of the religion of Christ, conceived as the worship of God in spirit and in truth, from its narrow ecclesiastical bounds, and its advance to new victories throughout the wide world. Another Pentecost is on the way. May the spirit of the Lord which is freedom and truth find entrance among the children of God with new glory and might.

HIBBERT TRUST.

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF THE TRUSTEES.

Another two years having elapsed since the publication of their last Report, the Trustees desire to furnish a short account of their proceedings during that time.

Mr. Alfred Hall, who was then their only scholar, after spending six months of the term of his scholarship at Jena and Berlin, returned to England at the end of December, 1899. Having taken his M.A. degree at the Victoria University in the following June, the Trustees made him their customary present of £50, and also presented him, as one of their scholars, with a grant of £25 for the purchase of books. In July last he became minister of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich.

At their meeting in December, 1899, the Trustees elected Mr. H. J. Rossington, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, to a scholarship for one year, commencing June last, and on the termination of the College session he proceeded to Germany, where he has been pursuing his studies at Berlin and Marburg.

Last December the Trustees elected Mr. E. Gwillym Evans to a scholarship to commence from the present June, but since his election Mr. Evans, having accepted an offer to become minister of the Chesterfield congregation, has asked leave to resign his scholarship.

In June last the Trustees renewed for another year their grant to the Rev. Ph. Moore, who has continued his studies in the ancient Eastern languages at Strasburg, where he intends to sit for the degree of Ph.D. For this, and for the completion of the essay which the Trustees required him to furnish, he states that a fourth year of study is absolutely necessary, and he has therefore applied for a further renewal of his grant for another year, which the Trustees have granted accordingly.

The term of six years for which the Rev. J. E. Odgers was appointed Hibbert Lecturer on Ecclesiastical History in Manchester College, having expired last June, the Trustees at their meeting in December, 1899, resolved to renew his appointment for a further period of six years from that time. In deference to Mr. Odgers's expressed wish they have however since agreed to his suggestion that the appointment shall be terminable by one year's notice on either side.

At the same meeting (December, 1899) the Trustees also resolved, at the instance of the Committee of Manchester College, to appoint the Rev. J. E. Carpenter as Lecturer on Comparative Religion for a term of six years from the following June, the Lectureship to be called the "Case Lectureship on Comparative Religions."

In the Trustees' last Report reference was made to an application which they had received from a number of their former Fellows and Scholars, for assistance in the publication of theological works of scholars of repute and their sympathy with its object and their willingness to consider any definite proposal. In response to this intimation the Trustees received an application to publish a work by Dr. Drummond on the Fourth Gospel. This they gladly undertook to do, but the publication of the book has been postponed in consequence of Dr. Drummond's time being occupied at present with the life of Dr. Martineau, which he and Professor Upton have undertaken to write.

At their half-yearly meeting in December, 1899, the Trustees resolved to subscribe ten guineas a year for three years to the Stopford Brooke Lectureship, at University College, London, "in recognition of his sacrifices and services to the cause of Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form."

At the same meeting an application came before the Trustees from the Governors of Willaston School, Nantwich, for a grant towards defraying the salary of a master, amongst whose duties should be the special teaching of religious subjects, the conduct of daily morning prayer, and the school services on Sunday, and the general guidance of the religious and moral education of the boys. Willaston School was established on the foundation of a Trust Deed, dated September 6, 1898, executed by the late Mr. Philip Barker, of Nantwich, who made a special condition that the scheme of education should include the "history of the growth of religious and rational theological thought and opinion in England and generally in religious subjects . . . in modes and by teachers free from the obligations of prescribed creeds or tests of religious belief."

The Trustees have agreed to contribute part of the salary to be paid to such master, and at a special meeting held on April 26, 1900, concurred in the appointment of the Rev. J. H. Woods, of Manchester College, Oxford, who entered upon his duties on the opening of the school in the following September.

At their half-yearly meeting in June, 1900, the Trustees passed the following resolution, referring to the death of Dr. Martineau:—

That the Hibbert Trustees, at their first half-yearly meeting after the death of Dr. Martineau, desire to place on record their deep reverence for his character and genius. They remember with feelings of veneration that his long life was devoted to the service of that pure and simple Christianity to the furtherance of which the Trust is dedicated, and that he so brilliantly exemplified in himself those high scholarly attainments which it has been one of the leading objects of the Trustees to foster in those who were preparing for the Christian Ministry. With gratitude would they refer to the sympathy and advice which he was always ready to communicate to them, particularly at the time of the inception of the Hibbert Lectures, and to the eloquent defence of the principles of religious liberty and the free study of Theology which from time to time they heard from his lips at the social gatherings after their summer half-yearly meetings. In him they have lost not only a great and distinguished man, a leader of thought and defender of spiritual faith, but a personal friend whom they must always remember with heartfelt respect and affection.

The vacancies in the Trust mentioned in their last Report, caused by the death of Mr. Russell Martineau and the non-attendance of Mr. C. W. Jones, were filled by the election of Mr. William Arthur Sharpe and Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., respectively. Since that date two further vacancies have occurred in the Trust, caused by the retirement of Mr. H. P. Cobb, before the meeting of December, 1899, on account of ill-health; and by the retirement of Mr. Gair last July, on account of his inability to attend the meetings of the Trust owing to his advancing years. The following resolutions were passed by the Trustees:—

That the Trustees accept with regret Mr. Cobb's resignation, and desire to place on record their appreciation of his services to the Trust, first as Secretary, and subsequently as a Trustee.

That the Trustees accept with sincere regret the resignation of Mr. Gair. They desire to place on record their sense of obligation for many years' valuable services, especially for the great interest he has taken in the "Case Fund," and the careful attention he devoted to details connected with it. They venture to hope that though he is no longer able to take part in the management of the Trust, they may yet have the pleasure of seeing him sometimes at their social gatherings.

The two vacancies thus created were filled by the election last June of Mr. Talfourd Ely, in the place of Mr. Cobb, and the bye-election this day of Mr. Richard Durning Holt, of Liverpool, in the place of Mr. Gair.

THE CHURCHES IN CANADA.

Contributed to the "Christian Register" by the Rev. Albert Walkley.

In Canada, like the rest of the world, we have more ecclesiasticism than religion. The Churches are an important factor, both Protestant and Roman Catholic. Perhaps the first thing to attract the attention of the student is that Quebec is mostly Roman Catholic, while Ontario is given over to Protestantism of the most pronounced Evangelical type. Out of a population of 1,500,000 in the Province of Quebec there are 1,300,000 Roman Catholics. In the Province of Ontario, out of a population of over 2,000,000, the Roman Catholics number only 350,000. They are not equal to the Church of England, to say nothing of the great number of Methodists. In Quebec the Roman Catholic Church is ultramontane, while in Western Ontario it is of a more liberal tone. There it is in the midst of Protestants, and has Irish leaders, who make friends with their Protestant sister churches. In all Canada there are nearly 2,000,000 Roman Catholics, with a hierarchy composed of one cardinal, seven archbishops, sixteen bishops, and three vicariates apostolic, this being in all twenty-seven bishops. Altogether the Roman Catholic people of Canada are 41 per cent. of the total population. This Church has great influence upon the whole political and educational life of the Dominion. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, the Minister of Public Works, the Speaker of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Commons are Roman Catholics.

Next to the Roman Catholic Church in numbers comes the Methodist Church. The largest body of Methodists is known as the "Methodist Church of Canada." In the year 1883 four separate Methodist churches formed a union, which has made Methodism a power in Canada. Altogether the Methodists claim nearly 900,000 adherents; that is, nearly 17½ per cent. of the population. Their greatest strength is in Ontario, where there are 650,000 of them. The oldest religious paper in Canada belongs to this people. They aim to be loyal—too loyal—to the teachings of John Wesley, as far as the letter goes. They are Arminian in theology, and have promise of coming to the fuller theology of Jesus.

If the Methodists are great in numbers, the Church which comes closest to them in this respect is perhaps greater than they are in the possession of the wealth of Canada. The Presbyterian Church of Canada, with its splendid organisation and its sturdy Scotch blood, has and is a great power, not in religion only, but in all that affects the Dominion. It comprises nearly 16 per cent. of the whole population; that is to say, it has over 750,000 adherents. They are strong in Ontario and Nova Scotia, and lead all other churches in Manitoba, whether Catholic or Protestant. They are stoutly Calvinistic in doctrine; and one detects very little weakness or leaning toward a more tender theology, which might countenance creed revision. They are valiant in their fight against the Church of England's pretensions to state recognition of any kind. When the memorial services to Queen Victoria were held in the Church of England cathedrals, the Presbyterians made it plain that such services must not be considered state affairs. They held services of their own. The Roman Catholics also find the Presbyterians opposite them in the councils of the State, when there is any attempt made by the Roman Catholic Church to use the State to forward its ends. Methodism may be the hands and feet and even the heart of Protestantism in Canada; but Presbyterianism is the backbone, and a stiff one at that.

Not the wealthiest, but the Church that lays most claim to a certain kind of state recognition is the Church of England. The contest was a long and bitter one which kept the Church of England from being a state church. It set its face in early days against the undue influence of the democratic spirit. It has always sought to be aristocratic and the church of the officials. Each of its archbishops is, in the newspapers and among their own people, spoken of as "His Grace"; and a bishop is "My lord," though none of them have any claims to such titles. They are given so as to be in touch with the "Church of England" in England, and to give a kind of state character to the Episcopal Church. In Quebec the Church of England is the largest Protestant church. In Ontario its numbers are about half those of the Methodist Church. In all, the Church of England numbers over 600,000 adherents; that is, over 13 per cent. of the population of Canada. There are twenty bishops, two of whom are archbishops, and one of these archbishops is the primate. Though this church goes by the name "the Church of England," its ablest defender and advocate in the early days was a Scotchman, Bishop Strachan. To-day one of its archbishops is a Scotchman, the primate; while the other is an Irishman. The tendency among the churches of this denomination is towards ritualism. At times its controversies with the Roman Catholic Church as to the right of the Church of England to be called Catholic are rather strange, when one remembers the early history of Canada, when on the ground of its being Protestant the Church of England claimed certain state endowments. To-day the people of this Church like to be known as "Anglicans."

The consistent and earnest enemy to all state recognition is the Baptist Church. The first Baptist church in Canada was an offshoot of the Second Church of Swansea, Mass. It was founded in the middle of the eighteenth century in what is now Sackville, N.S. The man to whom, perhaps, belongs the credit of breathing the breath of life into the Baptist Church of Canada was Henry Alline, born in Newport, R.I., who removed to Falmouth, N.S., in the year 1760. What wonder the Baptist churches oppose all union of Church and State! This Church is to-day very strong in the Maritime Provinces and in Ontario. It is about 6 per cent. of the population of the Dominion, numbering over 300,000 adherents. Perhaps there is no church in our land which is so sure that it has the very plan of church government set forth in the New Testament, and that its interpretation of the doctrines of Christ and his apostles is the only correct one. There seems to be no compromise with liberal Christianity in this great body of believers.

After leaving the Baptists, the figures drop below the 100,000; the Lutherans show over 30,000; the Congregationalists, a church of the open, democratic spirit, hardly reaches 30,000. The Congregational polity is not as well adapted to the people of Canada as the Episcopal or Presbyterian. And, as for the Unitarian Church, it is a little one among the hosts of Israel. But that the liberal spirit is needed in Canada throughout its whole life is something most apparent to every one who has lived here or has studied either our history or our people.

OBITUARY.

THOMAS FREDERICK WICKSTEED.

Mr. T. F. Wicksteed, C.M.G., late Secretary and Registrar of the South Australian Government, died on Saturday, 27th, at his residence, Freelands, Oliver Grove, Norwood, at the premature age of fifty-three. The eldest son of Mr. Frederick Wicksteed, of Adelaide, South Australia, Registrar of the diocese of Adelaide, and younger brother of the late Rev. Charles Wicksteed, he was born in the colony in 1848, and after being educated privately, entered the service of the South Australian Government as a correspondence clerk in the General Post Office in 1875. In 1887 he was appointed chief clerk and accountant in the office of the Agent-General in London for South Australia, and in 1894 Secretary and Registrar of South Australian Government stocks. Only last year he was created a Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George for his services to the colony.

Soon after coming to England Mr. Wicksteed went to reside at Croydon. He had been brought up in the Anglican Church, but after settling in Croydon he joined the Free Christian Congregation. He served on the Committee and was indefatigable as a worker for the Domestic Mission at Dennett Hall.

Severe pressure of work in connection with the changes that have recently taken place in the Australian colonies, in addition to his ordinary duties, proved a heavy strain on even so vigorous a constitution as his. An attack of the heart, followed by pneumonia, proved fatal after a few days' illness.

Mr. Wicksteed's official duties and position were not such as to bring him prominently before the world. The true value of his work can be known only to a few friends, and those with whom he worked. His knowledge and experience, his tact and personal bearing, above all his single-minded devotion to duty and entire uprightness of character, marked him as one of those who are the real support of the name and fame of England and the Colonies. He was a valued member of the church to which he had attached himself, and his generous nature and kindly disposition endeared him to many friends, who will mourn his loss.

Mr. Wicksteed was married in 1870 to Miss Julia Matthews, of Adelaide. She survives him, with three sons and two daughters.

A memorial service was conducted on Tuesday morning, 30th ult., by Rev. J. Page Hopps at the Free Christian Church, Croydon, prior to removal of the remains for cremation at Woking. Although the time fixed for the service was necessarily early, many friends were present to testify respect and affection for their deceased fellow member.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Florentine Picture and its Lessons.

It is not about any one of those great religious paintings enshrined within the walls of the churches of Florence, or placed in her long galleries, that I have something to tell you just now. These, when you are older, you may sometimes enjoy and study, and, just so far as you are endeavouring to make your own lives good and true, will you be able to see the full beauty there is in them, and to read aright the lessons they have to give.

The picture I am thinking of is not enclosed by the walls of church or gallery; it is open to the bright Italian sky above it, and is found in the very centre of the beautiful City of Flowers.

I will tell you what this picture is.

In the midst of the gay, busy city, almost in the shadow of her great domed cathedral and its beautiful bell-tower, is a plain building in a line with others much like itself on one side of the Cathedral square. From the door of this building a very strange procession is moving, summoned there only just now by the ringing of the bell in the tower close by. Each of the dozen men or more who form the procession wears a long, loose black dress with a hood, covering him completely except that there are openings left for the eyes. After a moment's pause, in which some direction is given by their captain, the little black band—the Brothers of the Misericordia—start off through some of the narrower streets leading out of the square, amongst them carrying a litter upon which there is a comfortable mattress for some one who has had an accident or some invalid to rest upon while being moved to the hospital; this, too, is covered by a long black cloth.

Just as the Brothers are turning the corner into one of the side streets, a very large flock of doves suddenly swoops down from among the marbles and sculpture of the bell-tower, and alights in the square. At once the birds surround a man, who at a time well known to the doves, comes there laden with grain; in a moment they are perching upon his hands and arms and shoulders, perfectly fearless, and made as happy as possible by the constant and thoughtful care which, for several hundred years past, they and their tribe have received from the city of Florence, from those times when the city was disturbed by the noise of war, when all communication with her army outside was very difficult, and messages of warning, which saved the Florentines from disaster, were fastened round the necks of the swift-winged doves, hastening back from the open country to their accustomed haunts within the city walls.

I must tell you a little more about the Misericordia Brothers in the picture. The name means Brothers of Mercy; their Society was founded many centuries ago, and is joined by men of all ranks in the city. The object of the Brotherhood is, to give personal service in helping those to whom illness or misfortune has come, and who have no one to care for them. Very closely are the Brothers endeavouring to follow in the footsteps of their great master, who required of his disciples that they should bear one another's burdens if they would fulfil his law. The strange dress, covering them completely, is worn in order that they may all alike be unrecognised while on their errand of mercy, so that no one of them may be specially rewarded for his help; a cup of cold water is the only gift that a Brother may receive for any service.

The Misericordia Brotherhood can count among its members some of the highest in rank and some of the richest among the citizens of Florence; and yet these men, whose rank and wealth enable them to live a life of ease and luxury, are ready at any moment to leave whatever they are doing, and in their turn to assemble in the Cathedral-square to receive directions where their help is needed, just as you see them before the house of the Brotherhood in the picture. It sometimes happens that from a brilliant ballroom, leading out of the shady inner courtyard of some rich Florentine house, one of the Misericordia Brothers is seen suddenly to leave at the sound of their bell; leaving to go and put on that unattractive dress, ready to be sent into some wretchedly poor quarter of the city, it may be tenderly to nurse, in dreadful disease, some one who has no one to help and comfort him, from whom other men have stood far off because of possible danger to themselves. Or, perhaps, the service of the Brothers is needed to arrange for the reverent and careful burial of some one who, in the midst of the city of pleasure and of flowers, has died a lonely death.

Men, too, without rank or wealth join the Brotherhood, men oftentimes carrying heavy burdens of their own; rich and poor, side by side, are the Misericordia Brothers found when misfortune has come to their less happy fellow-citizens.

For the busy city all round it, the picture in the Cathedral-square has its lessons. For us, too, it has lessons, not new ones, we have all of us often read the same lessons before; but we have often, too, forgotten them, forgotten to obey that law of kindness to one another when it required from us some sacrifice—that law which the Brothers of the Misericordia made it the aim of their lives to obey, at whatever cost of ease or pleasure.

And that other law of kindness to all dumb animals, more dependent for their happiness upon us than we are upon one another—have we not sometimes forgotten to give the same constant and kind care to those creatures that have chosen their homes near to ours, which the city of Florence gives to the doves that live among the stones and marbles of her great cathedral church?

Remember, then, the good Florentine Brothers in the picture, and be ready sometimes to give up something that you like very much to have, or to do, if it will make you better able to lighten the burden, however little, of some poor child in your own city or neighbourhood; some child made with the same desire for pleasure and happy things as yourselves, living in the midst of sad poverty, oftentimes in real want, and without any of the things that make you so happy from day to day and from week to week!

Remember, too, the happy doves in the Cathedral-square in Florence, happy and fearless in the safe-keeping of the city; and although it cost you time and trouble, let all creatures that come about your homes, as far as you are able, be as happy and as safe in your care. You will like to think of the birds made happy in the hot days of summer, because you have spent some of your time in giving them water to drink and to bathe in; safe, too, in the frosts of winter, when all the ground is bound fast in ice, from the sad death of starvation, because your hands have put out bread and grain for them.

In obeying these two laws—the law of kindness to one another, and the law of kindness to all dumb creatures—you are helping, children, to move away, if only a very little, that deep dark shadow of pain and unhappiness which is always spread more or less over some part of this beautiful world. Your loving hearts and willing hands may help, if you will, to fill with sunshine some part, let it be ever so small a part, over which the dark shadow of pain and unhappiness has been wont to lie.

Alice Hincks.

AT SIXTY-FOUR.

In Life's young day how far away
  Seemed then of years one score!
But now, in sooth, my long-lost youth
  Returns at sixty-four.

Near and more near its scenes appear,
  The acts performed of yore;
While new-born things, on spreading wings,
  Take flight at sixty-four.

From books of old which truth unfold,
  The Word of sacred lore,
We still receive that morn and eve,
  The after and before.

Make up the day. Life's seven-act play
  Follows the ancient score.
Our eve and morn, despite man's scorn,
  Are one at sixty-four.

Is, then, for man, this the whole span?
  Has Life no gains in store?
No harvest fields of fruitful yields
  Beyond threescore and four?

O foolish heart! Act well thy part:
  Life's cup still runneth o'er.
The Past is done; but work begun
  Goes on at sixty-four.

The spirit mounts, and sacred founts,
  Refreshing as of yore,
Each step reveals; the veteran feels
  He's young at sixty-four.

Life's evening glow, no passing show
  That comes and is no more,
Is Youth's fair dream and Hope's bright gleam
  Fixed fast at sixty-four.

And Faith espies, through golden skies,
  That brighten more and more,
The pearly gates where Love awaits
  Beside the heavenly door.

LONDON, AUGUST 3, 1901.

THE RATHBONE STATUE.

ON Friday of last week, in presence of some thousands of people, a statue of Mr. WILLIAM RATHBONE was unveiled at Liverpool by the Lord Mayor in St. John's Garden, a fine site to the west of St. George's Hall, on which there is already more than one statue of distinguished citizens of Liverpool. The statue is in bronze, by Mr. G. FRAMPTON, R.A., and is ten feet in height, standing on a pedestal of white stone, which bears Mr. RATHBONE'S name on a slab of black marble, and on the other three sides bronze bas-reliefs, commemorating some of the chief features of his life, what he has done for the home nursing of the sick poor, his Parliamentary work, whether for local government or Poor Law reform, and his great interest in education.

It is a happy feature in this public honouring of a good citizen that he is still at work, in spite of the burden of his years, keeping fresh the many interests of a long life of active beneficence, and still eager to render some further service to his country and to the community with which his whole life has been so intimately associated. The tribute of honour and affection was entirely spontaneous, and representative of the whole community, from the humblest to the highest. No one had been asked to contribute, one of the Secretaries of the Committee declared, and it was the offerings of the poor that would most touch the heart of WILLIAM RATHBONE. Among those who sent letters of regret for absence were the Earl of DERBY, Sir WILLIAM TATE, Bart., the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, Dr. JOHN WATSON, Mr. ALFRED BOOTH, the Right Hon. WALTER LONG, M.P., and his Honour Judge BAYLISS. Mr. BRYCE wrote:

I greatly regret that it is out of my power to be present in Liverpool to-morrow at the unveiling of the statue of my old and deeply-respected friend, William Rathbone, whom his fellows are honouring in a way which does honour to themselves, for it shows how highly they appreciate those admirable qualities of high public spirit, earnest and single-minded purpose, and constant devotion to good causes which have marked the whole of his long career. Those qualities won for him in Parliament universal confidence and respect from his fellow-members, and I can think of few persons in Liverpool who fulfilled in equal measure the duties of a good citizen and a worthy representative of a great community.

The Lord Mayor was supported among others by the Bishop of LIVERPOOL, Sir THOMAS HUGHES, Mr. JOHN BRANCKER, Monsignor NUGENT, Mr. ALFRED HOLT, Mr. R. D. HOLT, Mr. HOLBROOK GASKELL, Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, Mr. H. W. GAIR, Mr. H. L. RATHBONE, Miss FLORENCE MELLY, Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, Mr. E. K. MUSPRATT, and Mr. W. B. BOWRING. The presence of Monsignor NUGENT recalls the memory of that other friendship in an earlier generation, which made Mr. RATHBONE'S home, Greenbank, "that house of refuge for all the saints," a resting-place for Father MATHEW, the great apostle of Temperance.

The Lord Mayor reminded his hearers that Mr. RATHBONE'S name is already engraved on the tablets of the Town Hall, as an honorary freeman, but, he added, it is yet more deeply engraven on the hearts of the people of Liverpool. The statue itself, which represents Mr. RATHBONE in the robes of a Doctor of Laws, recalls the fact that he has fitly received an honorary degree from the University College of his native city, a College which, for his wise foresight, his enthusiasm and the contagion of his generous example, rightly looks to him as the chief among its founders. The Liverpool Daily Post, in a leading article, speaks of the statue as worthily representing the dignity and the energy so characteristic of Mr. RATHBONE, and happily adds that in it he appears as he does in real life, "constantly devising wise and liberal things." Mr. A. F. WARR, M.P., in an eloquent speech at the unveiling, said that it was a peculiar satisfaction to them in connection with that commemoration, to be able to speak of Mr. RATHBONE as still present with them, "as a model and example of all that a citizen ought to be." And he added, as reported in the Daily Post :—

They had the satisfaction of telling him by the erection of that statue that they owed him for his lifelong services a debt of gratitude which they felt they could never repay, but which they might try, and meant to try, to repay by living up to the principles he preached and practised, by living more for the city's good. Happily, Liverpool was not yet so large as to have ceased to feel the tie of citizenship. They could try to make, and he believed they could succeed, in making Liverpool as a city an example to the whole of England. They could show that they believed in the value of education, by offering the highest opportunities of education to the poorest citizen in a University which would owe its existence mainly to Mr. Rathbone's inspiration. In days to come, when they would be ashamed to have allowed sect or party to thwart them, and when they would work in the spirit of him they were proud to honour; when there would no longer be in their midst dwellings in which family life, godliness, and purity were impossible; when the conditions of the life of seamen attracted Liverpool men back to their ships; when greater honour would be attached to civic service, and to social and religious work done irrespectively of creed or party; when that time came, as come it would, then that statue would recall to the citizens of Liverpool the life and work of one whose name had been reverenced for his services to the city he so deeply loved.

We could not deny ourselves the pleasure of gathering up these tributes to one whom we must delight to honour and to see honoured by his fellow-citizens. Our debt of gratitude to Mr. RATHBONE cannot be reckoned up or expressed in words. What our Churches owe to him is part of the record of the progress of the past fifty years. As in the wider sphere of his Parliamentary and public life, in his manifold philanthropy and private beneficence, so has it been in his zeal and care for the religious community in which he grew up, and to which throughout life he has been devoted. He has manifested a spirit of wisdom, of eagerness to use every opportunity of helpfulness, and to make fresh opportunities for service and the kindling of a better life, which with his constant overflowing generosity, has borne fruit in a measure seldom given to one man. To him, among the most recent of his many acts of generous thoughtfulness, we owe the new and cheap edition of the late JOHN HAMILTON THOM'S volumes of sermons, "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," and it is natural that we should associate together the names of these two men, closely connected by family ties and by life-long intimate friendship. It was a noble school of citizenship in which Mr. RATHBONE was trained, and to this was added the inspiration of a ministry rare indeed in its spiritual power, wonderful in its penetrating insight, as those sermons remain to testify, and beautiful in the richest graces of a lowly Christian discipleship. The ministry of JOHN HAMILTON THOM made great demands of those who heard his word. Of how true the response in the heart of WILLIAM RATHBONE we have been for many years the witnesses.

There are now statues of two WILLIAM RATHBONES in Liverpool; the memorial of the father is in Sefton Park, of the son by St. George's Hall. And this also is a happy thought, of the continuance of a noble family tradition. There have, indeed, been five William Rathbones in succession. The grandfather of the present bearer of the name was the friend of Roscoe, and one of the leaders of the Anti-Slave Trade party in Liverpool, a man of remarkable eloquence and undaunted courage. His son, whom we know as the elder Rathbone, whose fine presence the statue in Sefton Park recalls, was for sixty years identified with every public movement which aimed at the moral, political, or social improvement of his countrymen. He was known as "The Educationist," and was the friend of every one who had made any sacrifice for principle. For such a succession we may indeed be thankful, and rejoice that now a further memorial of its full fruition in our own generation has been so happily secured.

ETIENNE COQUEREL.

Only three months ago we had sorrowfully to record the death of Auguste Sabatier, Dean of the Protestant Faculty of Theology in Paris. Now, before the successor to his chair of Dogmatic Theology has been appointed, the Liberal Protestants of Paris and of France have to bear another very grievous loss in the death of M. Etienne Coquerel, who passed away, as we briefly recorded last week, in the night of July 15, in the seventy-second year of his age. Not a brilliant theologian of European fame like Sabatier nor yet a popular preacher like his father Athanase Coquerel, or his elder brother Athanase, Etienne Coquerel was yet a power among his own people, working in quiet ways, as a journalist, and a trusted friend and counsellor in all matters affecting the welfare of the Liberal Protestant Churches of France. If the position of the Liberals in the Church had been different he might well have filled one of the first pulpits in Paris, for the early promise of his preaching pointed to a career in that respect worthy of the high tradition of his family; and his learning, his judicial mind, his brilliant powers of exposition, might have marked him for a University chair of theology; but the influence of an orthodox majority in the Protestant Church had succeeded in setting such obstacles in the path of the Liberals, that he chose rather the less conspicuous task of religious journalism, in which, unhindered by ecclesiastical restrictions, the spiritual freedom he so highly prized, the ardent devoutness of his nature, and his keen enthusiasm for the Church of his fathers, and what he felt to be its true ideal of religious life and fellowship, could have full scope.

Etienne Coquerel was born at Amsterdam, November 9, 1829, in the year before his father, Athanase Coquerel the elder, removed to Paris, to enter on his great career as a preacher at the Oratoire. Thus the boy grew up and had all his schooling in Paris, until in 1848 he went to Geneva, and thence to Montauban, for the study of theology. At the latter school and at Strasburg he took degrees in theology, and after three years of ministerial service at Montauban returned to Paris, where in 1855 he was appointed chaplain, or minister in charge of the religious instruction of the Lycée Henry IV., one of the chief schools in Paris. This office he held until 1884, when he was succeeded by his son-in-law, M. Jean Réville, and in recognition of his work as a religious teacher, and in connection with many charities, he was appointed by the Government in 1894 Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

But it was as a journalist that his influence was most continuously and widely exercised. From 1865, when his brother Athanase had already been removed on account of heresy from his office in the Protestant Church, he was the chief editor of Le Lien, La Renaissance, and (for the last fifteen years) Le Protestant, the successive organs of the Liberal party in the Church. The champion of freedom and of a reasonable faith, earnest in his Christian discipleship and in his care for the inward life of devotion, a student of religious philosophy and history, he gave for thirty-seven years the riches of his mind and heart to this work. A keen politician, and the watchful guardian of the best interests of his Church, he was always scrupulous and generous in controversy, and commanded the respect of opponents as well as the gratitude and admiration of his friends, in the long battle he fought on behalf of the principles of Liberalism. Apart from journalism, his publications were chiefly pamphlets. In this country he was known as a contributor to the Academy and the Theological Review. Two articles of his in the Theological of October, 1872, and July, 1874, tell with intimate knowledge the story of the difficulties of the Liberal Protestants arising out of the General Synod of the former year, and bear witness at the same time to the earnestness of his faith in the power of truth and a free religious fellowship.

To his intimate knowledge of the affairs of his own Church he added a wide outlook upon the movements of religious thought and life in other countries. M. Coquerel was a foreign correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the news of English and American Churches in particular was furnished to the French Protestant Press largely through his instrumentality.

The loyal and devoted journalist was also a wise counsellor in the assemblies of the Church and as a member of the Délégation Libérale. His word always carried weight, and his business aptitude, his quick insight, and ready power of expression, gave him an influence which was gratefully acknowledged. In the service of education and of public charities he was also constantly active, with the same large-hearted devotion, while in his home and to the intimate circle of his friends he was known as a man of tenderest nature, in which love and truth were the most conspicuous elements.

M. Coquerel suffered last October a grievous blow in the sudden death of a beloved daughter, and although he bravely continued his weekly work for his paper and his other manifold activities he never recovered his old vigour. He was already suffering from the approaches of his last illness, when he attended on June 11-13 the triennial meetings of the General Assembly of Liberal Protestant Churches at Nîmes, at which he gave an account of our International Council Meetings in Whit-week and took part in some important discussions. On his return to Paris there followed days of growing weakness and patient waiting, until the end came in beautiful peace, as we have recorded.

The funeral on July 18 was conducted with the utmost simplicity according to his own wish and the Huguenot tradition. At the house a touching address was given by the Rev. E. Fontanès, an old friend and fellow-worker, whose name appears with those of Athanase and Etienne Coquerel among the minority who protested at the Synod of 1872 against the imposition of a fresh dogmatic test in the Protestant Church. At the grave Baron F. de Schickler on behalf of the Délégation Libérale, and others representing educational and charitable societies with which M. Coquerel had been connected, paid warm tributes to the memory of their friend, and M. Fontanès concluded the service with further words of affectionate appreciation and faith.

On behalf of English friends we may be allowed to add here our own tribute of honour and reverence for a life bravely lived and faithfully ended, with the assurance to our brethren of the Liberal Faith in France of heartfelt sympathy and of confidence in the cause to which they and we alike are devoted.

"A GOOD MAN."

A Vesper Address by the Rev. Joseph May, of Philadelphia.

Do you remember that cheering saying of the Psalmist—find it in the thirty-seventh Psalm—"The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way"?

"A good man." Is there any phrase more expressive or more comprehensive? The words are simple; but dwell on them and they are full of meaning. You cannot improve upon them—or say much more!

What a grand thing it is to be good! The world has many pitfalls, into which even honesty may stumble, or kindness may slip; weakness very readily goes astray; how easy it is to be selfish, worldly, harsh in judgment, wilful! How hard to be perfectly true; to be pure in every thought; gentle in speech; reverent towards God; always charitable, loving, generous towards men!

That word "good" is compact of all these latter meanings.

The next best to it is perhaps that other, of which the Old Testament is, also, very fond—"righteous." "Righteousness," too, intimates, especially, one element of goodness which must never be wanting—the element of firmness; the power to stand steadily on one's own feet; to resist overbearing pride; to oppose evil men in an evil day; to say "no" frankly and decisively to many of the solicitations of prosperous, luxurious, ambitious times.

A good man may hardly be a weak man, in a world like ours.

A good man must be one who takes active share in what is going on in the world. We are put here to serve; to do a task for God and man; the good man looks out for his—and does it. He may have not only to resist the temptations which bad men hold out to him, but to thwart the schemes they devise. He has responsibilities resting on him; to his family, to his neighbours, to his fellow-citizens—all these he must discharge. He has powers which he must diligently use, as God gives him scope. Perhaps he has worldly means, or opportunities; these he must faithfully apply and improve—for the world is to be helped on by them and he must see to this.

But a good man never more shows himself good than in the private relations. Proportionately, one does vastly more, for good or ill, for those nearest to him than he can do for others. Private relations try goodness very steadily, on all sides. The virtues of patience, forbearance, gentleness, tenderness, courtesy—these, family-life tests and calls for, all the while. How often we fail of them! He whom we name the good man sets one of the finest of his examples in the relations of his home.

And, indeed, the domestic relations test particularly that essential quality of goodness—its perfect genuineness and sincerity. A good man is good in his closet, in secret where no eye but God's sees his actions or discerns the current of his thoughts. It is the poise, the assurance, the repose, the force he acquires in his secret life with himself and God, which, coming out in more public places, irradiating all that he does, marking his path with kindness but with force, with generosity but with decision, with sympathy but with vigour, make a good man what he is, and reveal him as such to his fellows.

Many are pretty good. Not often, I think, we single out that fine phrase as that which just befits and truly describes one, so that, instinctively, we sum up all we can say of him, and call him, simply, "a good man." Have you known such? Yes, —some, I hope. All of us, thank God, encounter some of them, among the rest. I have known a number; and I think no one thing in one's life's experience is so reassuring as to know and remember such. A few faces shine before me as I speak the words; here and there, in half a century, I have met a good man!

When I have, he was not always also a great man, as we commonly reckon greatness; not always a rich man, though quite as often such; not always learned, or polished, or profound; but there was that core of character in him, that strong bold, sincere, manly instinct for the right and alliance with the true, which mark a man as a true servant of God, a God-like man; for of God Himself we can say nothing so precious, nothing so admirable, so adorable as that He is good.

Have not the good men you have met been happy men? They had the struggles, the difficulties, incident to humanity; perhaps some of the faults which trouble the characters and harass the careers of most of us. But they seemed—did they not?—to have a charm against these things. Where another was sure to speak the hasty word, they did not speak it. Where another yielded to selfishness—only a little, perhaps—they did not yield; where passion betrayed others, it failed to betray them; honesty, honour, respect for others' rights and interests, love for others' welfare, kept them true in situations where others—somehow—failed to stand firm and true.

Why should they not be happy, then? It is our faults, our petty or graver sins, which mar our peace and make us unhappy—not our misfortunes or pains, nor even our afflictions. Mere poverty need not destroy happiness; nor mere ill-health; nor mere narrowness of circumstances; nor even the loss of those dear ones who make the light of our lives; all these things may be so borne that still we shall be happy.

But selfishness, dishonesty, greed, petulance, wilfulness, pride, impure appetite, false ambition, worldliness—these things cannot be borne at all, if one is to be happy. One cannot live a day in their company and be truly happy. There is nothing for it but to cast them out.

The good man has cast them out. Or, perhaps, by God's grace, they never had a lodgment in his soul and his life. What shall make trouble for him, then? Surely not the things God sends. For he loves God, and what he receives from Him is dear, because it comes from Him.

So the good man may be happy. And when I have met and known one, he always was happy—though sometimes poor, and sometimes sick, and sometimes lonely, and sometimes, even, pretty weary of the task of life, when it was very hard. I have seen a good man on a bed of racking pain, which year after year tortured him incessantly, as muscle after muscle shrank and stiffened; and still his laugh was so contagious, you would have said, when you heard it through the door, here was some child of gladness, who had never known a pang! I have seen one, year after year, carrying the normal burthens of an active life, full of good deeds, full of efforts for the improvement of men and the coming of God's kingdom, and so going counter to much of the pride of this world and its established abuses and vested wrongs; sorrowing with the sorrowing; pitying the distressed and living to share their distresses; threatened, sometimes, by the bad of low station or of high; yet how serene, how cheerful, how happy, day by day, from morning to evening, and when day came again!

And why should it not be so? Does not the old saying tell us why it must be so? "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord"—and so the strength of God, the peace of God is in his heart. It is the being on the Lord's side, at one with the eternal plans, at one with the truth and right, which upbears a good man. He may even, himself, not stop to analyse his own peace of mind; he may even not realise wherein he is different from many of his brethren—"Why callest thou me good?" he would say, if you should ask him—and yet the fact will be there; the good man is guided, upheld, inspirited by God; God is with him, care cannot molest him, for he who does only what is duty, only what is for God, casts, though he knows it not, his care on God. Even success in duty is not what he is aiming at, but to do all that he can in duty; and so, even when his best efforts are thwarted, his best plans fail, still he may have peace. Even the misery and sorrow of the world do not so appal him that he cannot be happy; for he lives in the faith of God; in a sure confidence in the right; he knows that all must at length issue well—so strong is his trust in God, in truth. Though he should fail, should even perish, yet his cause, God's cause, cannot fail!

What a beautiful spectacle, the life of a good man! Shall we not also believe those last words of our text, "God delighteth in his way"? Yes, there must be spectacles which gladden the heart of God, and what can more delight Him than that of honesty, purity, charity, fidelity, activity, patience, incarnate in one of His children? Ah! it must be, if we may reverently think of it, bliss intense to the mind of God to look over all the things He has made and see them all, good; to see the circling planets, the flaming suns, to hear the song of the morning stars. But to Him who is Spirit, what is the whole world of matter, beside a single soul? That on which we look, rejoice, and are made at peace—the spectacle of a good man—God has called nothing into being which can so rejoice Himself as this!

"A good man"; why do we not all make this our ideal? the goal of our eager purposes, the desire of our hearts? When shall we be so wise as that? When shall we learn the lesson of every past age, that the one secure thing is goodness; the one rewarding thing is goodness; the one honourable thing is goodness; the one thing attainable by all, and which death itself cannot touch, nor mar, nor cause to fade, is goodness.

"I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging their bread."

"Mark the perfect man and behold the upright—for the end of that man is peace."

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
  The bridal of the earth and sky,
The dew shall weep thy fall to-night,
  For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue, angrie and brave
  Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in his grave
  And thou must die!

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
  A box where sweets compacted lie,
My music shows ye have your closes
  And all must die!

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
  Like seasoned timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal
  Then chiefly lives.

FROM COPENHAGEN.

A Message of Thanks.

To everyone of all those, who by Mr. Armstrong have sent us a kind gift and a loving thought, do we send our warm sincere thanks. We see in them the proof of a true brotherly love, and as such they are to us a blessed message from God.

We have now not only been enabled to pay for our organ, but have a sum left for the printing of a Unitarian hymn-book, and it is a pleasant thought to us, that when on Sunday mornings we sing our hymns, we shall in this way hear your voices mixed with ours.

Mr. Armstrong's visit here has been a source of joy and strengthening to all who came in contact with him. We have got nothing to offer in return for all we receive, but the repetition of this poor little word "Tak," but if you will receive it as it is spoken it will be a strong and loving link between you and

YOUR "YOUNGEST BROTHER."

THE men who in every age have thrilled their fellows, have always been conscious that in their best efforts they were not so much the originators, as the channels of a force flowing through them, they knew not whence.—J. Brierley.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MINISTERS' SUPERANNUATION FUND.

Sir,—Will you allow us on behalf of the Committee of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund to express our deep gratitude to the friends who, as your advertising columns have recently shown, have afforded to our cause such prompt and generous support. Since last week's list went to press, the following gifts have been received or promised:—

Donations.	£	s.	d.
Mr. J. P. Thomasson, Bolton ...	1,000	0	0
Mr. Lewis Haslam, London ...	50	0	0
Mr. J. W. Scott, Bolton ...	50	0	0
Mrs. Crook, Bolton	30	0	0
Mrs. Price, Chepstow	25	0	0
Mr. Hans Renold, Manchester .	25	0	0
Mrs. Blake, South Petherton ...	20	0	0
Mrs. Bowman, Bolton	20	0	0
Mr. Russell Scott, Sevenoaks ...	20	0	0
Mr. Percy J. Winser, Bebington	10	10	0
Mr. Franklin Winser, Nottingham	10	10	0
Messrs. Bradshaw & Gass, Bolton	10	0	0
Lieut.-Col. Trevelyan, Penzance	10	0	0

Mr. G. Webster	1	1	0
Annual Subscriptions.
Mrs. Webb, Hitchin	5	0	0
Mr. Franklin Winser, Nottingham	1	1	0
H. M., Manchester	1	1	0

More than £10,600 has already been subscribed towards the £18,000 needed to secure the two donations of Mr. Colfox and Mr. Nettlefold (£1,000 each), which will complete the capital sum of £20,000 for which the Committee ask. The vacation season will now bring to everybody a much-needed rest. In the autumn the appeal will be renewed to the churches at large. As this fund has been initiated by a vote of the National Conference, the responsibility for its success cannot be legitimately thrown upon the wealthy only, it demands the help of all. Arrangements are accordingly in train for holding meetings at Mansfield (in connection with the North Midland Association), Birmingham, Leicester, Liverpool, Belfast, Leeds, Sheffield, &c., to present the scheme for the help alike of laymen and ministers. It is of great importance that the whole fund should be promised by the end of the year, for working plans cannot be safely formulated till the requisite means are guaranteed. The splendid response already made fills the Committee with confidence that the first year of the Twentieth Century will see this work achieved. May this confidence be justified!

THE EDUCATION QUESTION.

Sir,—I have read with the interest and respect, which anything that proceeds from my honoured friend, Mr. Rawson, always commands, the letter in your last issue. Moreover, I am in such entire sympathy with his desire to root out the virus of sectarianism from our public education, that it is strange to be engaged in any controversy with him. I will not go at any length over the ground of our difference, as I have already indicated it. My fear, which I hope may be needless, is that the policy of the two Education Bills of this year, combined with the animus behind them, portends an attack all along the line upon local control of education, whether by County and Borough Councils or School Boards, and the re-endowment of denominational schools out of the public rates, to be expended in ecclesiastical interests by ecclesiastical managers. I am afraid of sectarianism more rampant in education than ever at the expense of the nation. And it is because the School Boards are the point on which the attack on popular control is directed by the Bills, and by Sir John Gorst, in his scandalous diatribes on men who have served their country without fee or reward, that I repeat that they are the fort to be held.

H. Enfield Dowson.
Larne Farm, Northrepps, Norwich,
July 30.

Sir,—May I add a few comments to this interesting correspondence?

1. Denominational struggles for the control of national education are not the creation or prerogative of the School Board system, and will not cease when School Boards are destroyed. The histories of our own and every civilised country for three centuries prove it.

2. The cumulative vote is a chronic vexation, especially to election agents; but it has its compensations. For instance, there would be more educational progress in Parliament if the Catholic vote of Lancashire could be "cumulated" on one or two direct representatives instead of exercising by a few votes in each of a score or two of separate constituencies a septic influence upon the principles and strenuousness of as many M.P.s.

3. There has been unpleasant sectarian strife on School Boards. But do not forget that this is the insignificant "by-product" of a great operation exorcising sectarianism and sectarian propaganda from the schools. In thirty years unsectarian and efficient education under public control has been provided for millions of children. Every child has had to be fought for, and apparently will have to be fought for again.

4. Ecclesiastics may not always be the most suitable men to sit on public bodies; but many School Boards and the House of Commons have discovered that the ecclesiastical layman is worse. County Councils seem anxious to have the same experience.

5. The School Board system is the repository of a great Charter won after many years fighting against the enemies of national education. The main points of the Charter are (1) the right of the ratepayers to spend their own money on their own schools without a statutory limit; (2) the obligation to provide sufficient and efficient education for every child under drastic penalties; (3) the obligation to retain public money under genuine public control, and not fritter it away in subsidies to people who place private and sectarian interests before the public welfare; (4) the maintenance of absolute religious equality in the schools; (5) the publicity of all transactions and expenditure; (6) the limitation of fees to the means of all available scholars; (7) the exclusion of denominational tests for teachers and managers; (8) the subjection of the whole organisation of popular education to direct popular control with unrestrained freedom to the electorate in selecting its representatives without disqualification on the ground of sex, profession, residence, or income.

6. The fight with the present Government is not as between School Boards and County Councils: it is whether the above charter of popular rights shall be surrendered or emasculated or maintained and extended. The Councils are but a pawn in the game. No one proposes to hand that charter unimpaired to them. None of the points appear in the Government Bills. They all "accidentally" disappear in the proposed transfer from the old authority to the new.

7. We often read in police-court reports of an operation known as "the confidence trick." The victim in invited to show his confidence by placing his fortune in a hat, where the operator will himself deposit an equal or larger sum of bank notes. The notes are counterfeit. Both deposits quckly disappear in the hands of a third party. The trick is greatly facilitated if an accomplice, or better still an innocent onlooker, stands by and says: "Yes. It seems fair. It is a good bargain." We are not inclined to place the people's educational charter on the table in return for counterfeit notes marked "County Council" merely to show our confidence in the hereditary and persistent enemies of popular education, even though they operate through a Tory Marquis and a Liberal-Unionist Duke. On a suitable occasion we are willing to discuss genuine reforms with anyone we can trust.

8. School Boards and School Board members are, doubtless, as your correspondents suggest, a poor lot: I am one of them myself, and ought to know. But, like the ass which carried the Ark of the Lord for King David, they carry a precious burden, and we may remember that although that poor ass stumbled, this weakness was held not to justify Uzza in laying violent hands upon the Ark. The ill-fated Uzza failed to distinguish between essentials and non-essentials: he has had many successors.

SYMPATHY WITH MOSLEMS.

Sir,—I have read with interest the letter in The Inquirer of July 20, on symyathy with Moslems. A few months ago I received a letter from a Moslem gentleman at Madras, a descendant of Saadat Ulla Khan, of the Carnatic, c. 1720, in which he says:—

Permit me to offer you the sincere thanks of my community for a very valuable work which you have been kind enough to publish—I mean "The Birth of Islam." . . . In this connection, I beg to state that the Musulmans feel the necessity of a work in English on the martyrdom of the meek Hussain. . . . There is, as you know, nothing so touching in the history of the world as the tragedy of Kerbella. The story of the martyrdom of Hussain alone makes one to be patient, humble, meek, and forgiving. There are many works on this subject in Persian and Urdu, but there is none in verse in English. If the work of the kind suggested to you be published, I hope it will take the place of many Persian and Urdu works, as there is a growing desire among Indian Mussulmans to have religious books in English.

I need hardly write to you that the martyrdom of Hussain is looked upon much in the same light as the crucifixion of Jesus. As the cross is the symbol of patience, forbearance, fortitude, and forgiveness for Christians, so the Punjah is for Musulmans.

Should you be pleased, Dear Sir, to kindly pay your attention to the subject, and inform me of the same, I beg to assure you that I shall be most happy to furnish you any information, and even books, in Urdu and Persian, which you may require.

This morning (July 22) I am in receipt of another letter from the same gentleman, in which he says:—

I beg to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of a copy of the "Birth of Islam," which you kindly sent me, and also for the manuscript copies of the hymns on certain verses in the Koran. They are, indeed, well written, and I wish to publish them in a small pamphlet form if I could get a few more.

As to your suggestion that Indian Moslems would do well to petition our Government for a law authorising any Muslim man and woman who so wished to contract a marriage which should be necessarily a monogamous one without ceasing to be a proper Muslim marriage, I may be permitted to state that I don't think there is any necessity for the law. The majority of the Musulmans, especially of light and lead, look down on men who practice polygamy. If at all there are any who practice polygamy, they are, I believe, very few. The state of our society has considerably changed. It is not what it was some years ago. Now no parents of a girl consent to give their daughter in marriage to one who has already married one. If the young man happens to be one who wishes to marry for the first time, at the Nika ceremony, he is made to promise that during the lifetime of their daughter he will not contract any other marriage. With such and similar restrictions polygamy is fast becoming obsolete. . . .

I shall be extremely thankful to you should you be pleased to arrange and call for an essay from Englishmen on the hero of Kerbella. With a view to encourage the study of Indian subjects, I wish to award a medal once in a year to the best English essay on the martyrdom of Hussain and the lesson that can be learnt therefrom. I shall be obliged if you could kindly take a little trouble on my behalf and arrange to invite essays on the above subject; and on your selecting the best and sending it on to me with the name of the essayist, I shall forward to you the medal with the name of the essayist engraved on the medal.

If, Mr. Editor, you will kindly make this matter known, I shall be happy to play the part which I am asked to play in it; but instead of deciding myself on the best essay, I should prefer sending all the essays to my Moslem friend for him to award the medal. Possibly some of our ministers may see their way to killing two birds with one stone by preaching a sermon on the martyrdom of Hussain, and sending it in to compete for the medal.

Before closing this letter I should like to anticipate a question which may be asked of me—namely, where to find the details of the martyrdom in the English language. I know of no record of them except that given in Gibbon's History. Possibly some of your contributors may be able to give further information.

"WIRELESS MESSAGES."

BY THE REV. J. MORLEY MILLS.*

"And this is the message which we have heard (or received) from him, and announce unto you, that God is light."—1 John i. 5.

The Marconi system of wireless telegraphic communication, with which everyone is now somewhat familiar, opens up new vistas of thought to the contemplative. A glimpse is caught of a universe pulsating with vast unseen forces. They are coming to our planet from planets and suns, and sources, distant untold millions of miles, along invisible conductors. And in turn our planet is projecting, with what energy it can, currents which are being registered on moon and sun and stars, at distances too great to measure. Yet there is nothing new in these things. Light, electricity, form, sound, colour, and the great world-forces have been here from the beginning, only waiting for recognition. It is our recognition of them that is new. In proportion as we develop eyes to read their signs, and ears to hear their messages, do we comprehend our universe. Through measureless ages, and from lowliest origins, human life has been working up to a perception of these things, until now the mind, simply by its power to receive, has become a universe in itself. By knowing and appropriating these unseen forces, and conforming to their laws, man becomes mighty with their might, and beautiful with their beauty. There appears absolutely no limit to this process. So far as one can see, it will go on until the whole stupendous total of cosmic force will be open to our disposal.

Wireless telegraphy a new thing? Nay, with one of old we exclaim, in the light of these thoughts, "There is nothing new under the sun." Not only in the natural world have these unseen currents been passing and repassing, on invisible media of communication from planet to planet, but in the spiritual world has something similar been happening from the earliest stages of soul history. What we have read or heard about the wireless telegraphy only suggests to the spiritually minded what a magnificent world we are born into! The human soul is surrounded with mighty currents of spiritual force coming from the Great Source of all spiritual life! God is pouring out upon all flesh countless messages of wisdom, truth, and love! We are living in the very highway of these messages! But, as in the natural world, so in the spiritual, only one here and there in a nation, or a century, has had the necessary receptivity of soul to catch the same—the eyes to read their meaning, the ears to hear their voice. The great poets, philosophers, prophets and teachers have been the receivers and interpreters of these messages from God to the soul of man. The Jewish writers undoubtedly conceived of the correct phraseology when they recorded that "the word of the Lord came" to such and such an one. The message recounted to those about them by these seers is clearly no word from the man of the street, the market place, or even of the schools. It is so entirely above all things thought by these, and also at one time thought by the man who himself uttered the message.

No; the word is clearly not a creation, but a reception.

At one time it is a message on righteousness, at another on sacrifice. Then comes a word on duty, and on holiness, and by-and-by there comes to the world that greater, grander message of Love. So Moses and Elijah, and Isaiah and Hosea, and Socrates and Zoroaster, and Buddha and Jesus stand out, with others we cannot name just now, as sons of the race highly enough endowed to receive at first hand some message of God for men. As we think of them they seem to stand together on some mount of transfiguration. Jesus is their spokesmen, and he is saying "As the Father communicated unto us, so we spake." And this is the message which we have received and declare unto you, "that God is Light and ye are children of light; that God is Love and ye are the children of love; and, that ye love one another." Then, in chorus, these great men of the race seem to say "The world is full of messages from God. 'He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.'"

Oh, how deeply in need is the world today of the deciphering of these messages. And yet, sad to think, it is as ignorant of that which it is missing, as we were of telegraphy until electricity was discovered. How vast a number go through this life having eyes yet seeing nothing, ears yet hearing nothing, minds and yet registering nothing of these messages of God. And why? Paul tells us "the carnal mind cannot receive the things of God"—i.e., the mind that is selfish, coarse and vulgar. You and I, and thousands more, might pass before one of Marconi's receiving instruments, knowing nothing of its meaning, while yet messages of the deepest import to us were being hurled across sea and land. We might see the movement of the needle, but it would have no significance for us, beyond exciting our wonder that a detached thing like that should so act. No, the receiver of the message must have been in contact with the sender; he must have learnt something of his science, his language, and his signs. Then, seeing the needle in motion, will he get paper and pen, and write out the same, and declare it unto those concerned.

Would we see the movement of this other needle on the face of the earth, would we feel its throb on the mind, would we be able to decipher the message it is recording from God? We must, then, cultivate purity of heart, love of soul; we must get into contact with God, learn of Him in the stillness and quietness of seclusion—must get an insight into the language of the spirit, and its signs of expression. Then we, too, may place our receptive souls in line with the current, catch the message and decipher the same. And, since God does not send a message to one which is not meant for all, we may be bearers to others of good tidings of love and salvation. Continuing thus to cultivate ourselves, we shall, as the years go on, realise a sense of perpetual enlargement of life. The surface upon which the Divine currents play will broaden and increase in sensitiveness. And ever as we progress shall we realise that our highest intentions, our holiest aspirations, are not of our own making, but are consciously registered messsages from the Infinite.

It may be, however, that we are not dowered with the higher sensitiveness necessary to receive and decipher these wireless messages direct from God. Then what shall we do? Let us listen to the declaration of those who have received such for our help and joy, and tell that which we have heard to others who need to know it.

On the banks of the Adriatic Sea live a number of poor fishermen; they put off in their boats and row away out of sight of the shore, and there they will remain all night through, intent on their fishing. When the evening sets in you may see the wives come down to the beach. Why are they there? Look they never so eagerly they cannot catch a sight of their husbands; the little fishing craft are far too distant. Ah! they know that perfectly well; but see! they are bending their faces towards the water; and, listen! they are singing together the first verse of their sweet evening hymn. They cease, and wait—wait patiently for a minute or two; and then across the waters steals the sound of singing; it is their husbands' voices taking up the strain, and continuing the second verse of the hymn! In some mysterious way the waters have the power of bearing sounds on their surface for very long distances, and these people, as their heart's longings have gone out to one another, have cultivated their faculty of hearing to the required intensity. So, after the response has come to them, these women have joy, and hasten to tell the children and old folk that the fathers live and love, and that all will meet in the morning!

If we may not go out into the ocean of truth and spiritual experience, and receive at first hand messages from the divine as the greater ones of humanity have done, we can imitate these women of the Adriatic. We can go with our longing souls to our rooms, or to our church; there we can kneel in prayer with our minds open to catch the faintest inspiration. Then, pausing, while we read or meditate, we may catch into our souls the voices of the great receivers of the past. We may comprehend the meaning of these words as they come to us over the surface of the centuries. "This is the message which we have received from Him and announce unto you, that God is Light, and though it be darkness with you, with Him is no darkness at all." Again we listen, and again the words come, faintly but distinctly, "This is the message which we have received from Him, God is Love, and ye are the children of love." Once more we listen, for we want to know what God would have us do, and once more comes the word, "This commandment, or message, have we received from Him, That ye love one another."

Then, as the significance of the repeated message from God to the fathers of our race sinks into our souls, a divine joy takes the place of our doubt and sorrow; a holy love overcomes our low, coarse thoughts, and a high purpose fills our lives. Then do we rise from listening and go forth to tell those about us who are still ignorant, doubting, and despairing—tell them the gladdening message that God is Light, that God is Love, and that the great duty of life is to love one another. Tell them of the message that inspires us—the message that, in the morning of the life beyond the night of death, we shall behold the faces of our dear ones, and be for ever with the Lord, no longer groping in the darkness, but rejoicing in the light.

LITERATURE.

THE METHOD OF EVOLUTION.*

THE author of this book is already well known as a competent student of Biology, and one who has the rare gift of clear, judicious, and condensed exposition. In his present work he presents to the educated lay-reader a review of the subject of Evolution as it stands to-day, at a time when our younger investigators are abandoning the methods of speculation and excessively theoretical discussion which have prevailed hitherto, and are searching for the laws which control "variation" in the world of life to-day, both in the special forms of the animal kingdom and in the mysterious "physical basis of life"—"protoplasm." The author has given an extremely judicious, impartial, and instructive review; he takes no side, but (as far as possible) lets the different theories throw light on one another. He distinguishes at the outset between the undoubted fact of organic evolution, and the explanation of its method—the causes which have brought it about; and then he reviews the chief contributions to this vexed problem, which have been suggested from Darwin to the present time. Very few names and references are given—it is only a comparison of theories, as such, and regarded as modifications or criticisms of Darwin's fundamental views. The explanation of Weismann's theories is very clear.

The result of the review is forcibly to suggest how little is really known as to the efficient causes of the Evolution of Species. Natural Selection must be regarded as a real operative cause; but even Weismann is driven to admit that it cannot account for all. The pressing problem of the present day is one which neither Darwin nor Weismann appear to have fully appreciated. In his concluding summary the author says (p. 402):—

The nature and cause of variations, the question whether they are wholly fortuitous, or whether they occur in lines determined by some more fundamental unknown force, whether they are adapted to their purpose before selection or whether adaptation comes only because of selection, whether there are yet unknown forces which determine the reappearance of similar variations in many individuals at once and for many generations—all these questions are still unanswered. Their answers are plainly to be found along the lines of the study of variation and protoplasm, if they are to be found at all. These two topics are, therefore, the ones which present-day naturalists are eagerly investigating. The study of variation is showing us how natural selection really acts in the world, it is disclosing the significance of discontinuous variations as well as minute variations, and is possibly disclosing the appearance of variations along determinate lines.

The book may be recommended to all who are interested in biological evolution but cannot follow the discussion in its various ramifications in scientific journals.

SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AT LLANDYSSUL, JULY 23 AND 24.

THE history of religion in these parts has never been written. We have traces of early Druidism and Catholicism in some of the place-names in the neighbourhood; but no living representatives. Nonconformity, however, flourishes. Though it is not known that John Penry (1559-93), the morning star of the Reformation, extended his labours into this parish, there can be no doubt that his influence, like the ashes of Wyckliffe, spread far and wide. "It hath been my purpose," said the young man of thirty, "always to employ my small talent in my poor country of Wales, where I know that the poor people perish for want of knowledge; and this was the only cause of my coming out of that country where I was, and might have stayed privately all my life." At thirty-four his career is cut short by his enemies, and he is cruelly despatched, his wife and four children among the spectators. But the good cause, even though John Penry's body, like that of John Brown, lies mouldering in the grave, is still marching on! John Penry's mantle was picked up by Stephen Hughes (1620 ?-88), one of the 2,000, who was ejected from Meidrym. He did not confine his ministrations to one spot, and owing to the persecuting spirit of the age, he had to be very careful in his selection of a place of meeting. The old cave of Cwmhwplin, near by, is held sacred to this day, because of the shelter it afforded him and his fellow-worshippers in their time of need. For some time previous to 1698 meetings for worship were held under an immense oak tree at Pantgwyn; and about that time, or shortly after, the old chapel of Pant-y-creuddyn was built on the Gellifaharen Estate.

It was in 1721 the Rev. Jenkin Jones (1700 ?-42) entered Carmarthen College, and there probably he caught the infection of heresy, which he conveyed later on to his mother church, making it the storm-centre of that movement, that revolt from Calvinism, which spread over a large part of South Wales, causing many heart-searchings, and making the orthodox associations look to the safety of their fortifications and to pass resolutions. Dr. Thomas Rees gives the date of the "Great Arminian Controversy" as 1729; but Jenkin Jones had built Llwynrhydowen, the first church founded in Wales in the interest of Free Thought, in 1726. At the time of his death in 1742, Mr. Jones "had the satisfaction of seeing six or seven influential ministers and their congregations brought over to embrace and profess his sentiments."

The present Association, whose first meeting in the new century was held on the dates mentioned above, was first incorporated at Neath on Friday, Oct. 8, 1802. Its objects, as explained in the circular published in 1803, were to stem the tide of infidelity which was then spreading over the land, to maintain the cause of the Christian Religion, search its contents, defend its truths, and place its doctrines within reach of the public.

The Association, which has often been in a state of suspended animation, has done a good deal of useful work from time to time in publishing Unitarian literature. It was reorganised at Pontypridd in July, 1895, and since then it has been well in evidence every year. This was the second annual meeting to be held at Llandyssul, the first having been in July, 1884, on the opening of the chapel. The congregation was established in 1868 by the Revs. W. Thomas and T. Thomas, though there had been preaching for twenty or thirty years previously. From the diary of the Rev. John Thomas we find services were held very regularly for some time after 1846.

At the annual meeting on July 23 and 24, the ministers present were the Revs. Thomas Thomas, J.P., Green Park; R. J. Jones, Aberdare; John Davies, Alltplaca; R. C. Jones, Lampeter; T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool; W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul; D. Evans, Cribin; T. Arthur Thomas, Llandyssul; Lewis Williams, Rhydygwin; Tyssul Davies, B.A., Cardiff; T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen; David Evans, Cwmbach; David Rees, Pentre-Rhondda; Gwilym Evans, B.A., Chesterfield. The Students: E. E. Jenkins and J. Islan Jones, B.A., Manchester College, Oxford; E. D. Jenkins, Simon Jones, B.A., and David Davies, Home Missionary College, Manchester; J. P. Kane, late of Presbyterian College, Carmarthen; J. Park Davies, University College, Aberystwyth. Outside Ministers: The Rev. Thos. James, M.A., Calvanistic Methodist; D. Jones, B.A., Curate of the Parish; E. D. Phillips, Baptist; J. E. Jones, Wesleyan.

The first service at seven on Tuesday evening was introduced by the Rev. David Evans, and the preachers were the Revs. D. Rees and T. Lloyd Jones.

The Committee for the election of officers and business of the Association met at 9 A.M., on Wednesday, in the Wesleyan Chapel, kindly lent for the occasion, the President, Mr. L. N. Williams in the chair. The balance-sheet of the Association, read by the Treasurer, showed the income of the current year, including Sunday-school section, to be about £61. The account of the Ymofynydd, which is now one of the assets of the Association, and has been conducted under its auspices for the last six months, was very creditable. A number of grants for the current year were made. The Sunday-school section was established on its own basis with its own Committee and officers—President, D. Evans, Cribin; Vice-President, W. J. Phillips, Nottage; Secretary, T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen; and Treasurer, Mr. David Davies, Gellionen-ganol. The officers of the Association were also elected for the year: President, W. James, Llandyssul; Vice-President, T. Lloyd Jones, Liverpool; Secretary and Treasurer the same as before.

The next quarterly meeting is to be at Cwmbach; the next annual meeting at Gellionen—preacher, the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas. A devotional service followed at 11 o'clock, conducted by the Rev. Lewis Williams, and the President gave an address on "Our Inheritance and our Responsibility."

A vote of thanks to the President for the address and his services during the year was cordially passed.

In the afternoon the devotional part was taken by the Rev. John Davies, and the Association sermon was delivered by the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, F.R.G.S., Swansea, his subject being "The Place of Reason and Emotion in Religion." Complete reports of both address and sermon, accompanied by portraits of President and preacher, and also of the Chapel at Llandyssul, will appear in the August number of the Ymofynydd.

The evening service, on Wednesday, was taken by the Rev. D. Rees, and the Revs. T. J. Jenkins and R. J. Jones preached.

Collections were made at all the services, and amounted to £10 13s. The meetings were largely attended by representatives of all our churches in Cardiganshire as well as of other denominations in the place. The singing was very good and effective, and bore testimony to the training produced by the annual musical festival. These meetings, which were successful from every point of view, give great encouragement to persevere in the good work. Notwithstanding other powerful attractions of the age, preaching as well as the associations of worship have a strong hold of the feelings of the Welsh people; and Welsh Unitarians must still cling to the sermon as the chief agency in the work of their testimony.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—The annual tea party and concert of the Old Meeting House were held on Monday last. Over 200 took tea, and at the concert in the evening several solos were given, and the children of the church performed a cantata, which seemed to take very well. Mr. Richard Bedlington occupied the chair.

Aberdare: Highland-place.—The anniversary meetings of this church took place on Sunday last. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, B.A., of Carmarthen Presbyterian College, preached to fair congregations both morning and evening, the sermons being much appreciated. Special hymns and anthems were sung. On the previous Thursday the Sunday scholars had their annual outing, and a few days earlier the choir had their summer excursion to Weston-super-Mare.

Chelmsford.—The summer excursion of the congregation and school to Clacton-on-Sea was held on Wednesday.

Chowbent (Atherton).—The old chapel was reopened on Wednesday evening, July 24, after extensive alterations and improvements, due to the gift by Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., of a fine new organ. To secure sufficient space for his gift, Mr. Eckersley has also generously built an organ chamber running out from the gallery on the south side, and beneath it a new entrance with much-needed vestibules, of which the woodwork is of Dantzic oak, harmonising with the older portion of the building. Above the doorway is a sundial. The bricks are specially made so as to course with the old work, built at a time when these were much thinner than now. In the space between the pediment is placed a large panel of bricks specially made for carving, on which has been worked the inscription, "Chowbent Chapel: To the worship of Almighty God and to the glory of His Holy name." A mural brass plate has also been placed in the main vestibule, the inscription on which is as follows:—"In loving memory of Thomas Hoyle Hope. Born January 5th, 1834. Died November 7th, 1899. Member of this congregation, serving it with rare self-sacrifice. For many years its secretary and legal adviser. As a regular worshipper within this chapel, devoted to the religious faith for which it stands, he would undertake on its behalf, the humblest or the highest duty. Of the history of this congregation, as of the township generally, his knowledge was unrivalled. To interest the rising generation in that history was one of his chief joys. In the civic and social life of the district he gave himself for the public good with uncalculating devotion." The organ, which is a very fine instrument, is said to have cost over £1,000, while the structural alterations must have meant at least £2,000 more. The organ bears a brass plate with the following inscription:—"This organ and the vestibule to the chapel were the gifts of Charles Eckersley, Esq, J.P., in the year 1901. This inscription is here placed by the congregation in grateful recognition of its indebtedness to Mr. Eckersley and his family, whose ancestors have been associated with this religious society throughout its long history." At the opening of the organ, a recitation was given by Mr. R. H. Wilson, Mus. Bac., chorus director of the Hallé Concerts, and the choir also rendered some choral music. At the conclusion of the service a brief meeting was held in the school, under the presidency of the Rev. J. J. Wright, who expressed the gratitude of the congregation for what had been done by Mr. Eckersley, and the members of his family, and by the brothers Harrison to improve and beautify the chapel. He then presented to Mr. Eckersley a settle made from some of the old oak taken from the chapel, in token of their appreciation of what he had done. The settle, towards which practically every member of the congregation and school had subscribed, is beautifully carved, and in addition to an inscription, bears the motto, "Write me as one who loves his fellowmen." Mr. Eckersley gratefully acknowledged the gift, which he said would recall to Mrs. Eckersley and himself memories which were very dear to them. The reopening services were continued on Sunday, July 28, and on Wednesday, July 31, a further organ recital was given by Mr. John Harrison, of London a son of the Rev. Dr. Harrison, a former minister of the chapel.

Cirencester.—On Sunday last the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., who is on a visit to his father. Good congregations assembled, special anthems were sung, and the services were altogether successful.

Colwyn Bay: North Wales.—The first of the series of Sunday morning services, arranged to be held in the Pavilion, Victoria Pier, took place last Sunday, when the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington, preached to a congregation of sixty-five persons. Some difficulty has been experienced in obtaining local assistance, and there is need still for singers and a player.

Evesham.—A Gardan Fête and Sale of Work was, by kind permission of Mrs. Geoffrey New, held at Greenhill Park on Wednesday, July 24, in aid of the Oat-street Chapel Improvements Fund, and to clear off a debt of £19 on the Incidental Expenses Fund. Prizes were offered in Ping-pong, Golf-Croquet, and Clock Golf Tournaments for ladies and gentlemen; and a comedietta, Chalk and Cheese, was three times performed by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Cliff and Miss Martin. In the evening the gardens were illuminated, and there was dancing on the lawn, a string band having been engaged for the afternoon and evening. Unfortunately the morning and part of the afternoon were very wet, which seriously interfered with the success of the fête, but in spite of this £36 were taken, and the expenses are not expected to exceed £8.

Gloucester.—At the distribution of prizes on July 26, at the Crypt Grammar School (from which John Biddle was dismissed for his Unitarian opinions in 1645), the speakers included the Bishop of Gloucester, Dr. Ellicot; the Rural Dean, Canon Scobell; and the Unitarian minister, the Rev. Walter Lloyd.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—The Choir and Social Union excursion to Oxford on July 18 was enjoyed by forty-nine members. Lunch and tea were provided at Manchester College; Magdalen, Christ Church, and Merton were visited in the morning, and some of the time was delightfully spent in other College gardens and on the river. Miss Laura Float, a teacher in the Sunday-school, has just passed the London Matriculation in the first-class, and is going to Stockwell College for two years' training as a Board School teacher.

London: Stratford (Presentation).—A social meeting of the congregation was held on Monday, July 29, to bid farewell to the late secretary of the church, Mr. W. J. Hawkins, and Mrs. Hawkins who have lately removed to the south of London. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards and others spoke of the excellent work done by Mr. and Mrs. Hawkins during a membership of twenty-two years, for thirteen of which Mr. Hawkins had been secretary. Mr. Warne (who, notwithstanding his advanced age, had made a special effort to be present), on behalf of the congregation, presented them with a barometer as a small token of remembrance and appreciation of their services. Mr. Hawkins, in replying, thanked the congregation for their appreciation of his efforts. He still felt that Stratford was his home, and trusted that the work would go on and prosper. Mr. Noel referred to the losses sustained by the removal of families from the neighbourhood and spoke of the importance of young members coming forward to fill up the vacant places. There were a good many young people connected with the church, and, if they were in earnest, there should be no need to fear for the future of the congregation.

Strangeways.—A picnic was held on Wednesday, July 17, in connection with the Ladies' Congregational Society, when a small party of members, accompanied by the minister visited the new Holiday Home premises at Great Hucklow. The day was all that could be desired, and the journey by train to Hope, and the waggonette drive thence to Hucklow, among the Derbyshire hills and dales, were greatly enjoyed. Tea was served in the Day-room, and after a look round at the new premises, the chapel, &c., a return was made to Manchester. via Bradwell and Hope. On Saturday, July 24, the members of the choir and a few friends, to the number of twenty, held the annual picnic, to Southport, where, favoured with delightful weather, they lunched and had tea, boated and visited the parks, and otherwise enjoyed themselves, on the invitation of the Chairman of the Church Committee, whose liberality was much appreciated.

Taunton.—The annual Flower Show in connection with the Sunday-school was held on Thursday week, in the Memorial Schools, when the prizes were distributed by the Rev. G. V. Crook, the newly-appointed minister. In the course of the afternoon and evening entertainments were also given, and a successful rummage sale was held. The exhibits at the show were unusually good.

Trowbridge.—Sunday was the day of the school anniversary at Conigre Chapel. The chapel was beautifully decked with flowers. Sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Wain to large congregations. The collections, which were slightly in advance of last year, included a bag of 120 farthings collected by three of the little scholars.

Whitchurch.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held July 21, the preacher at the three services being the Rev. W. F. Turland. There were very good congregations, and the offertory was very satisfactory. The school treat was held July 30, on the kind invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Gresty.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Empress Frederick, the eldest child of our late Queen, and mother of the German Emperor, passed peacefully away on Monday evening at Friedrichshof, her castle among the wooded hills of the Taunus, not far from Homburg. For many months she had been suffering from cancer, and bravely faced the inevitable end. "The late Empress Frederick," said Mr. Balfour, in moving an address of condolence to the King, "was born an Englishwoman; she was by adoption a German; and all through her life she strove to promote to the best of her ability, with all the advantages which her high station gave her, that mutual comprehension, that sympathy between these two great nations, on which so much, in my opinion at all events, of the future of civilisation depends." And Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, in seconding the address, added the following tribute :—

The Empress Frederick, although she was seldom in this country and among us after her marriage—and what a vista of years that recollection carries us through!—yet never lost the place which as Princess Royal in her earlier years she won in the nation's heart. And besides this, there was a universal and profound respect for her character. Her Majesty's great mental gifts, the many accomplishments with which she adorned her life, her well-known enthusiasm in the cause of intellectual and civil freedom, her devotion to the great man who was her husband, and the fact, as the right hon. gentleman has said, that while she fully discharged all her duties in the exalted position which she occupied in Germany, she yet remained true to the land of her birth—these things have made our people proud of the Empress Frederick, and glad always to think of her as a British Princess. We deplore the loss to her country, and to the highest tendencies and aspirations of the age, which her death involves; and knowing as we do how close are the ties which bind the members of the Royal family together, we find it not only a duty but a duty which carries our hearts with it, to offer to them, and especially to His Majesty the King, a tribute of our sincere sympathy.

The King was united to his sister by the strongest ties of affection, and both for him and for the Emperor of Germany our people must join in the sympathy which the House of Commons has so worthily expressed.

THE Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of whose presence at the International Council meetings in Whit-week we shall long have delightful memories, is to sail to-day (Saturday) from Liverpool by the Leyland s.s. Winifredian for Boston. Dr. and Mrs. Crothers have spent the rest of their vacation on the Continent, and there has been no opportunity either in London or Liverpool for such a farewell as many friends in this country would gladly have given them. We must, therefore, be content merely to send after them our Bon Voyage! and Auf Wiedersehen! as a good international farewell message. The Rev. C. W. Wendté, the other American representative at the International Council, and its enthusiastic secretary, has, we believe, already returned home direct from the Continent, or we should have the same farewell for him also. Mr. Wendté, who when he came over was minister of the church at Newton Centre, Mass., has since accepted the important post of Secretary to the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston, with special charge of the Parker Memorial Church. This is work which will give full scope to Mr. Wendté's great organising ability, his devoted energy and enthusiasm for social reform, and we wish him God-speed in his new undertaking.

THE Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made arrangements for the delivery of a course of four lectures on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., at the University cities of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow during the month of November. The same course of lectures will be delivered at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Mr. Carpenter will also preach at Dundee as well as in the other Scotch towns. There have been several applications for lectures by Mr. Carpenter which the Committee are unable to arrange for at present, though they hope further courses at various centres may take place next year.

THE Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, minister of the First Unitarian Society of Chicago, who recently succeeded the Rev. W. W. Fenn, will visit England this month, and he hopes to remain several weeks. He is a son of the well-known Dr. John Pulsford, Congregational minister. He will be prepared to take Sunday duty if opportunity offers. His address will be Helensburgh, Scotland. He expects to be in London for a short time, when letters addressed to Essex Hall will reach him. Mr. Pulsford has already attained eminence in America as an able and thoughtful preacher.

IN the May number of the British Friend we read with great regret and sympathy an announcement that Mr. William Edward Turner, formerly of Liverpool and now of Colwyn Bay, who for some years has edited that valuable monthly paper, was obliged by the failure of his sight, caused four years ago by severe iritis, to relinquish the office in which he had rendered such warmly appreciated service. For some weeks after his illness Mr. Turner was quite blind, and he now finds the remaining defect in his vision too serious a hindrance to the proper discharge both of correspondence and of editorial work. In this privation Mr. Turner has the deepest sympathy of many friends, while they are thankful to know that nothing has happened to impair that inward vision which has made him so true and helpful a minister of the Spirit.

THE British Friend for July was the last number to be edited by Mr. Turner, and this month he is succeeded by Mr. Edward Grubb, M.A., who for some time past has been rendering efficient service to the paper. The address of the new editor is Devonshire Chambers, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C. In entering upon his office Mr. Grubb offers to his readers the following statement as to the spirit in which he will endeavour to maintain the high tradition established by the British Friend :—

To receive and deliver the message of early Quakerism; to carry to the present generation the gospel of a living Christ; to face with resolute courage the facts of life, and hold up to a distracted age, torn with conflicting passions and "hastening confusedly to unknown ends," the calm sure beacon of the Divine purpose revealed in the person and teaching of Jesus; to learn and teach the inward power of His cross; to bear witness to the reality and directness of Divine communion, the certainty of the Father's guidance of His willing and waiting children; such are among the aspirations with which he enters upon a task that can only be performed with a higher than human help.

That our Christianity may be conservative, as holding fast to all that is deep and true in the faith of those who have gone before us; evangelical, as being a real gospel for the sins and sorrows of men and women to-day, both as individuals and in their social and national relations; catholic, as recognising the many-sidedness of truth and the multifarious character of human needs—these are the thoughts we would hold before us, and for faithful adherence to which we would bespeak the earnest prayers of all who have at heart the cause of spiritual religion.

We noted a fortnight ago an article by the Rev. L. P. Jacks in the July Seed Sower criticising Dr. Warschauer's plea for Christianity as "The Religion of the Incarnation." In this month's Seed Sower there is a reply from Dr. Warschauer, but it does not seem to us that the last word has yet been said. One concluding remark of Dr. Warschauer's, however, we feel bound at once to challenge. We must, he says, make up our minds where we stand in this matter.

We must in candour cease pointing to Martineau as our chief representative if, as a matter of fact, we have abandoned his views on Christ. It may be hard to surrender the great name of Martineau, but if his views on a topic of such surpassing importance are no longer ours, then I do not see what other choice we have but to repudiate him frankly as our authoritative teacher.

Since when has Martineau been constituted our "authoritative teacher"? It is a description which he himself would have heard with the utmost repugnance, and would have indignantly refused. Our representative Teacher indeed he is, and one of the chief of his lessons is that we must take Truth alone for our authority, and not authority for truth. And we do not think that anything would grieve him more, in the breadth of his Catholicity, which cared above all for the spirit of the Christian life, than to find any passages of his teaching concerning Christ set up as a kind of doctrinal test, to separate between those who may and those who may not be reckoned as followers of his. For our own part we should say that Dr. Martineau's two sermons on "Christ the Divine Word," and Mr. Thom's sermons, both in "Christ the Revealer" and in the "Laws of Life," seem to require more careful study and more thorough exposition than they have yet received, in the light of their whole teaching as to the spiritual nature of man and the meaning of Divine revelation. To such study we should say that one fact would become quite clear: that the mediation of Christ is not as a substitute for the spiritual incapacity of man, but for the perfecting of his vision and the fuller nurture of his strength, who is already a child of God, in direct spiritual communion with the Father.

Will any reader of this note, who is familiar with the writings of Dr. Martineau, be good enough to tell us where the following passage occurs?—"The mere lapse of years is not life. To pace round the mill of habit and turn the wheel of wealth, to make reason our slave and thought our book-keeper, . . . Knowledge, truth, love, beauty, goodness, faith can alone give vitality to the mechanism of existence."

The greater the demand the greater the spiritual supply awaiting you. In the Divine economy the two are always in equilibrium.—Anon.

A MINISTRY OF FLOWERS.

The Children's Flower Fund, of which Lady Reay is the President, and Miss Mary S. Beard the hon. secretary, continues its quiet work of sending boxes of flowers to elementary schools in London. Such gifts are warmly appreciated by the children and their teachers, and it is pleasant to hear that the work is steadily, if slowly, increasing. Last year about 644 boxes were sent, as against 583 in 1899, and the number of schools or departments supplied was 67, as against 60. Several country schools have again helped in the flower-sending. To schools in dismal neighbourhoods it is difficult to realise how much good is done, and how much happiness brought to the children by such gifts. Last year's report quotes one message from the head mistress of an infants' school:—

They (the flowers) have made our hall look so bright and gay; the children thought the roses and pansies too lovely for the glass jars that we usually use, and one of them borrowed a glass dish from his mother in which we arranged them. I would like specially to thank you for the hardy root ferns. They are planted, and the children will keep them watered and watch their growth.

There is scope for such work as this in all large towns, and anyone who knows a school where flowers would be welcome could begin to do it, on his or her own account, even where there is not, as in London, the helpful agency of such a society as the "Flower Fund." For the sake of further suggestion in this direction, we are glad to print here the following "Directions to Packers," issued by the London Society:—

The boxes should be sent to the schools regularly at least once a fortnight, omitting the school holidays, which last from April 4 to April 15, and from July 24 to Aug. 26. They should be posted so as to arrive not later in the week than Thursday morning. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday are generally the best days for the schools.

Tin boxes should be used whenever possible. Biscuit tins—7 lb to 21b., according to the nature of the flowers—make the best packing-cases, but for hardy flowers wooden, and even strong cardboard boxes will serve. When it is desired that the box should be returned, a stamped and addressed label should be enclosed. The use of baskets is not recommended. A little damp moss round the stalks helps to keep the flowers fresh.

The object of the fund is to show the children wild flowers, but when these cannot be obtained garden flowers may be substituted. Leaves and flowers of trees, and, in the autumn, berries and nuts, are most acceptable to the schools. Each box should contain as many specimens as possible of one sort of flower, so that when the contents are distributed among the children each one may receive the same. When several species are included in one box, or anything uncommon sent, the teachers are glad to have the names enclosed. In packing it should be remembered that it is hardly possible to fill the boxes too full. It very rarely hurts flowers to be packed tight, but to be shaken about in the box is fatal to them. If there is time they should be put in water for a short time before packing. Small flowers (primroses, violets, &c.) should be tied in bunches.

It is particularly requested that senders of flowers will keep a careful account of the number of boxes sent, and of the postage and all other expenses, and will send it at the end of the summer, or from time to time during the summer if more convenient, to Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christ Church-road, Hampstead, N.W., who will send a remittance for the amount.

It will be seen from the first of these directions that the good work will begin again after August 26, and there is ample room for fresh volunteers who will undertake to collect and send off boxes of flowers to the schools.

There is also need of some new subscribers to secure the full continuance and extension of the work. Last year the working expenses showed an adverse balance of £1 2s. 5½d., the cost of postage of flowers having been £9 8s. 9½d., and other expenses £2 15s. 3½d. Subscriptions and offers of help may be sent to Miss Beard, at the same address, and she will be glad to answer any inquiries as to the work.

The work of the Children's Sand Garden in Manchester is now affiliated with that of the Collyhurst Recreation Rooms, and since the beginning of May has again been furnishing abundant interest and happiness and wholesome occupation to large numbers of children in that poor neighbourhood. The report of 1900 tells of a very successful season. The Sand Garden was open for six months, from May 2 to Oct. 31, every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, and the report gives the following account of the season:—

There were only eleven wet days, and on these occasions the children played in the Recreation Rooms. During the holiday-time very many children were turned away, as the Committee feel that they must still keep to the rule of not admitting more than 100 at once, unless they are able to secure more helpers. The children had a very good time, and every one noticed the improvement in their appearance and general behaviour, and it was particularly encouraging to find how much they are learning to help each other to observe the rules.

The gift of bulbs was again much appreciated. The children planted them, and their growth is watched with interest by their neighbours. On the opening day bunches of wild flowers were distributed to all the children. Now and again, through the summer, people have sent or brought flowers for distribution, and the Committee would like it to be known how delighted the children are with them, and that anyone wishing to send flowers may direct them to Miss Wolstenholme, Collyhurst Recreation Rooms, Willert-street, Rochdale-road, Manchester.

The accounts for 1900 show an expense of £7 19s. 2d. for sand and its transfer to the Garden, £12 9s. for superintendence, £3 8s. 3d. for toys, the total expense being £27 13s. 0½d. The year closed with a balance of £14 11s. 7½d. in hand, and as the ground has been for some time in a very rough condition, the Committee, seeing that the Sand Garden is now firmly established, have felt justified in having it gravelled. For the present year they have therefore incurred an expense of £24 for re-gravelling and the supply of sand. The Committee appeal both for subscriptions and for personal help. The hon. secretary and treasurer of the Sand Garden is Mrs. P. A. Herford, 27, Heaton-road, Withington, Manchester. In many of the town gardens of the well-to-do we know that loads of sand are brought in, that the children may have the delight of digging not only at the sea-side but at home. We should be glad to hear of the example of this Manchester "Sand Garden" for the poor had been followed in any other large town in this country.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF FRANCE TO RELIGIOUS PROGRESS.

BY THE REV. ERNEST FONTANES, OF PARIS.*

THE great principle of Non-subscription which, as I take it, forms the bond of union of this Assembly, has been maintained in France by those who are known as the Religious Liberals. It would scarcely be correct to classify them under the term "Unitarian," inasmuch as the opposition to the dogma of the Trinity was not the origin of their resistance to the system that imposed subscription to Articles of Faith, and Protestants who had not examined into the traditional dogmas for themselves, yet recognised that any compulsory subscription to a creed would jeopardise at once the sincerity of Faith and the normal development of Christian thought. It has not been without much effort and painful struggle that this principle has spread in our Reformed Churches, nor has it as yet won over the majority. Edgar Quinet, in his admirable book on "The Revolution," made it a subject of reproach to the Protestants, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, that they had ceased to keep alive the propagandist ardour of the Huguenots, and had been content to pass their religious life free from all molestation. The English Revivalists also, who made their appearance on the Continent shortly after the Peace of 1815, attacked this lukewarmness with a harshness which not infrequently injured the success of their cause. They imported a zeal without knowledge, they displayed a fastidious and inquisitorial asceticism, they introduced a worship of the letter which gave the right to any lay brother, however ill-educated, to assume the bearing and the fulminations of a pontiff. They aspired to restore the Church to the rigid conformity of the seventeenth century rather than to the heroic enthusiasm of the sixteenth century, and by their unwarranted questions as to the state of each individual's soul, and by their self-complaisant assumptions of bringing themselves amongst the elect and the saved, they wounded the susceptibilities of a people sensitive to ridicule, and naturally hostile to affectation and to exaggerations repugnant to good sense. It would, of course, be unfair to deny that these preachings created in certain quarters a genuine movement of religious life. But if Matthew Arnold is right in supposing that the Puritan movement in England was not indispensable for the revival of the religious life and for the establishment of Freedom, we may well wonder whether in our own country there could not have been a spiritual Revival without this extraneous intervention. Just as in England, where the brilliant critic drew attention to many symptoms and manifestations full of promise, we too are able to quote amongst other things this utterance of a martyr for political liberty, the famous Pastor Rabeard St. Etienne, who presided over the National Assembly. "It is about time," he said, "to urge upon theologians of all sects the wisdom of simplifying their creeds and of leading us back to the Christianity of Jesus Christ."

Under the pretext of raising the banner of the Reformation, in the doctrine of Justification by Faith, and of combatting the doctrine of Salvation by Works, the Church began to preach salvation through Orthodoxy, and was too carelessly preoccupied in denouncing heresy to perceive that to claim to be saved by fidelity to the letter of a doctrine was just as much to have recourse to a barren opus operatum, as was the case of Catholicism in its claim on behalf of works.

Vincent, the Apostle of Liberalism.

There arose a preacher at Nîmes, in the Metropolis, that is to say, of French Protestantism, who inveighed powerfully against this Intellectualism. This was Samuel Vincent, who constituted Nîmes the capital of the great idea of Liberalism in Religion. He did not belong to that class of Frenchmen who, dazzled by the splendour of the seventeenth century, live, as some foreign critics not long since reproachfully observed, "behind a veritable Chinese wall" of exclusiveness, to the neglect of other literatures. He was master of all the European languages, and was in close touch with all the theological writings of the time. He was known familiarly as the French Schleiermacher. He had in fact studied the works of this theologian-poet, and he had taken the initiative, at a time by no means favourable to literary activity, in establishing various periodical publications, such as the "Religious Miscellanies" and "Religion and Christianity," with a view to liberating his colleagues and co-religionists from an ignorance which had only been pardonable in the era of persecutions and during the wanderings in the Wilderness. In his principal work "On Protestantism,"* and in his "Meditations,"† he laid down that distinction between religion and theology which is nowadays accepted by everyone, and which is placed as the true foundation of all serious religious endeavours. Himself genuinely liberal, he was concerned for the liberty of others, and he undertook the defence of the Methodists in spite of the disturbing element they were introducing into the churches, as he undertook the defence of the Catholic priests, who, true to the rules of their Church, refused to perform the burial service in the case of Catholics who had died without receiving extreme unction. Broad-minded and conversant with the history of the organisation of the Reformed Church, he had no hesitation in declaring for the separation of Church and State, with the avowed object of securing to the Church the responsibility of its own government, and a flexibility necessary for its adaptation to the changing conditions under which it would have to exert its influence. As early as 1829 he foretold the fall of the temporal power. Accusations overt or thinly disguised under pious phrases left him unshaken. He withstood resolutely the mania for multiplying regulations, for manufacturing shibboleths, and for sifting the Church, maintaining that some questions must be left open, that attempts at explaining everything must be renounced, and that the Church should strive solely to fortify men's consciences and deepen and train their wills. He boldly declared that a little anarchy would do the Church no great harm, for the French Protestants stood in need of being raised to the general level of European religious culture, and might not unprofitably investigate, compare and modify old and new positions. He proclaimed that Protestantism was the religion of modern times, and he gave a definition of it which has come to be the watchword or banner of the Liberals. "Protestantism," he said, "is in its essence, the Gospel, and in its form, Freedom."

. . . . .

Another Witness.

One of his disciples, his young colleague, Ferdinand Fontanès, entrusted with the religious training of the young people in the Church at Nîmes, had an opportunity given him of bearing striking testimony to the non-subscribing principle. Two vacancies to Theological Professorships were announced at Montauban in 1824 as open to competition. Though the examiners candidly acknowledged the manifest superiority of Vincent's disciple, they yielded to the unfriendly representations of the candidate's colleagues, and by way of forestalling the reproaches of the more ardent amongst the orthodox, confronted him with a test, and added that unless he set his hand to this declaration of Faith, they could not give their support to his candidature. Although the terms of this improvised Test did not as a matter of fact run counter to his own doctrinal position, Ferdinand Fontanès, considering that he was applying for a Chair of Theological Science, declined to trammel the freedom of his studies and the teachings of experience. So quickly excited were orthodox prejudices in those days, that the translation of Neander's "Apostolic Age" by this uncompromising advocate of the non-subscribing principle was actually denounced some years later as imperilling the Faith of the Church.

A Period of Uncertainty.

Under the reign of Louis Philippe the National Church came largely under the influence of the middle classes, and was dominated by the Orleanist spirit. Its activity was spent in ecclesiastical wrangles in which the freedom from the yoke of creeds was at stake.

. . . . .

After the thunderbolt of the Revolution of 1848 the Protestants experienced the need of conferring with each other as to their future and the interests of their churches. The Consistories profited by the liberty of Association which had just recently been proclaimed, to elect delegates to a non-official Assembly which met propria motu at Paris in September, 1848. No sooner had it opened than a great debate took place on the system of imposing subscription to Articles of Faith. Everyone felt who breathed this fresh air of liberty which had succeeded to the stifling atmosphere of the late Monarchy with its privileged electorate (la monarchie censitaire) that the Rochelle Confession of Faith had fallen into desuetude, and that it would be vain to attempt to reinstate it as a law of the Church. But now the advocates of the system of Confessions of Faith pleaded powerfully with the delegates to set about creating at once a new Confession of Faith. A few impatient Liberals had solemnly moved to repeal the Rochelle Confession of Faith. But this vigorous and straightforward act did not fit in with the mood of the Assembly. The majority rejected the proposal, and contented themselves with addressing a kind of religious Charge to the congregations. The non-subscribing principle had not, it is true, achieved a complete success, but it had not been defeated. In the Consistories, where a Liberal spirit reigned, the status quo was preserved, and young candidates for the Ministry might now be ordained without being called upon to subscribe to any dogmatic formulary.

The length of M. Fontanès' paper has obliged us to make some omissions, as indicated in the text. The paper will appear in full in the forthcoming volume of the Proceedings of the International Council.

The Synod of 1872.

This partial victory of Nonconformist Liberalism was doomed, however, after the "terrible year," to be succeeded by a crushing defeat, which no longer enabled the Reformed Churches, in alliance with the Catholic Church, to represent the principle of Religious Freedom. M. Thiers had, in a weak moment, granted his old rival, M. Guizot, an opportunity of calling together an official synod with a view to re-establishing peace within the Churches. "M. Guizot's influence," said a leader of thought recently, "has been calamitous to Protestantism." The statesman in him had silenced the historian of civilisation. He it was who, whilst in power, was responsible for the dictum that "in foreign affairs France and Catholicism are synonymous terms." He, therefore, urged all the Churches to share in the trials of the Papacy, whose temporal sovereignty, he declared, was indispensable to the proper functioning of the Catholic Church. In order to oppose the rationalistic spirit which he saw was destroying the old conceptions of the supernatural, he advocated a coalition of all the Christian societies.

A New Confession of Faith.

The majority of this synod of 1872, recognising that the Rochelle Confession of Faith had no longer the character or power of an authoritative law, busied themselves in creating a new profession of faith to be based on the "Apostles' Creed." What a curious retrograde procedure in ecclesiastical politics! During the ecclesiastical struggles of the middle of the century the orthodox party had spoken with supreme disdain of this document which the Liberals had opposed to the dogmas that had become mere unintelligible shibboleths to simple folk, though highly effective instruments for purposes of proscription and excommunication. But, of course, the avowed object of this manœuvre was to embarrass certain ministers who had damaged themselves by their outspokenness, and thus either to silence them or eject them quietly out of the Church. The new Confession of Faith was carried by a small majority, and declared to be the basis of the Church. But though the orthodox party have succeeded in procuring from the Government of May 26 its authority to make this document the subject of compulsory teaching in the Church, they have failed, in spite of all the prejudice aroused by them against the Liberals, to make this Declaration of Faith the Charter of the Reformed Churches, and failed in particular to make it compulsory at ordinations.

This decision of the Synod of 1872 was the inevitable sequel to a movement of alarm and reaction caused by the Strasbourg Review. This Review, founded by Ed. Scherer and Colani, had subjected to a fearless criticism all the traditional doctrines, and had applied to the study of Theology the historical and experimental method.

The True Bond of Union.

Whatever one may say about this offensive retrograde step to the principle of subscription to articles of faith, the fact remains that the attempt of the Synod of 1872 to establish a protective barrier against heresy has signally failed. And though orthodoxy may impose its curtailed creed on a quite unofficial conference of ministers, it cannot prevent the annual roll-call of the Nonconformist clergy. The more serious the times are becoming, the more that social problems appeal to the attention of Christian people, the more untrammelled and scientific the labours of theologians become, the more self-evident does it appear that the bond of union of a religious society ought no longer to be sought in giving intellectual adhesion to a doctrine, which one is to repeat as a devotee tells his beads; but must be sought in a common spiritual feeling, in a moral disposition, in a living and active will.

A profound thinker, Secretan, who represents the philosophical element in the school of Vinet, has given expression to his experiences and his hopes about this question on which the future of the Christian churches so largely depends, in these words:—"To found the Church on a profession of Faith, is to stunt it by crippling its members. It is to doom it to endless internal conflicts."

. . . . .

From Catholicism to Negation.

The ecclesiastical quarrel noised abroad amongst the general public served admirably to deepen the prejudice against the body of the Protestant Church amongst the Catholics by birth who survived the ruin of their beliefs. A respectable instinct withholds them from joining a society where they fear to find neither peace of soul nor independence of thought. The ceremonies of Catholic worship leave in general a favourable impression on the faithful, particularly when the celebrant speaks the language of the world and lays no stress on superannuated dogmas. And when the religious need is not sufficiently pronounced, it cannot sustain an effort strong enough to change the religious designation of a family. A kind of point of honour, of filial piety, stands in the way of such a change, and many a middle-class freethinker continues his attachment to a church whose faith he has rejected, and considers a participation in the traditional ritual as the respect due to custom and to the good form of society. As for the working classes in the towns, the priest conceals God from them; and once they become disabused as to the efficiency of the magic means of their salvation, they reject en bloc every kind of religion, and one sees even Protestants confusing their pastors and their church with the priest and the Roman Catholic Church, being under the impression that a good Republican cannot also be a religious man, for God, they say, is the Master they must get rid of, if they are to be free men. Victims of an education which the systems of authority in matters of faith have imposed upon them, devoid of any critical spirit, they are unable to make the simplest distinctions, and apply to these problems of the moral life the dictum of the gambler, "All or nothing"—"a good Catholic and submissive, or a revolted Catholic and atheistic." Accordingly, we have heard attentive observers of the fluctuations and monotonous reactions of religious evolution maintain that, if ever this tunic of Nessus which is strangling the conscience of this country is to be torn off, it would require the intervention of a kind of glacial period, in which all the prevailing forms of religious life should be submerged and extinguished, so as to leave the human soul free to breathe out into the void its disconsolate prayer, and return like a child to the Heavenly Father whom it has so long misunderstood and forsaken.

Signs of a Better Hope.

All the same, there have been now for some time noticeable symptoms of a better future. In certain provinces where the Reformation had established churches which persecution alone had uprooted, there have appeared by an atavism of a good kind serious movements towards Protestantism which a zealous pastor, M. Robert, is directing with success. In Lyons, the second town of France, a spirited young pastor, M. Fulliquet, maintained with triumphant eloquence before a working-class audience that the thesis of his opponent, a sometime Catholic ecclesiastic, was by no means sound, and that the alleged crimes of God were nothing but the aberrations of a darkened mind and a confused moral sense.

The Leaven of Social Reform.

The increasing attention given to social questions has produced amongst the younger orthodox clergy an expansion of view which neither past ecclesiastical conflicts nor critical efforts succeeded in achieving. Just as missionaries whom contact with non-civilised races have convinced of the necessity of stripping the Gospel of its dry dogmatic husk, discovering its powerlessness to feed the spiritual life, so those who are desirous of reaching the people, the multitudes who wander like sheep having no shepherd, and to whom a stone has too long been offered instead of bread, have been led inevitably to relegate to the museum of antiquities many formulas and practices once serviceable enough as weapons of war, and to concentrate their efforts and their propaganda upon the inner moral natures of men, upon the sense of sin, upon the trust in the eternal love, and upon helpfulness to mankind, things which are the very soul of the Gospel of the Son of Man. A Christianity simplified and concentrated upon principles of which Christ himself was the Apostle and the Incarnation will alone succeed in drawing and retaining the multitudes, and in substituting for the old quarrels and schisms the methods of peace and a unity based on liberty. Then, again, the number of lapsed clergy goes on increasing, and the motives for these lapses are highly praiseworthy. There is a ferment amongst the clergy that augurs well for the future: men's minds are awaking, their consciences are asserting their authority, there is a craving for more light, a desire for less superstition and pious materialism, for a deeper moral and spiritual life and a genuine sincerity.

We cannot report any conversion of the intellectual classes to Protestantism, nor even to Theism, but it is quite evident that the positivist systems with their exclusively determinist philosophy have lost their prestige and their audacity; and under the débris of these systems, strewn on the ground like oaks felled by the woodman's axe, a better soil is being prepared to quicken the roots of the spiritual life. Anthropology disentangled itself gradually from the despotism of anatomy and physiology, and the bungling pseudo-scientist has carried in his very method the condemnation of that pseudo-sociology which made a fetish of the cephalic index.

The better cultivated the ground becomes, the more abundant will the harvest be, the more the human soul is opened out and enriched, the more spiritual will it become, and the closer will it cling to that Supreme Reality, that Moral Perfection from which it took its birth.

How Secure Progress for the Latin Race?

In drawing to a conclusion, let me mention what I believe to be the conditions of a religious propaganda amongst our population of the Latin race. I am persuaded, first of all, that we ought to avoid the temptation, to which the Church of Rome succumbed, of making it our first care to increase our numbers and boast of a majority. This ambition has beguiled the Church into pandering to popular superstitions. We must accept the situation that we are in a minority, while remembering that in the moral world it is not the big battalions that decide the direction of human progress. Far from casting an anxious glance on our small numbers, let us rather ask whether we have kept the spiritual leaven fresh and living, or whether we have put our light under a bushel, whether we are like the city set on a hill, or whether we have sunk back again into the shadows and dull round of uninspired mediocrity.

Further, we must diligently espouse the brave and earnest counsel of M. de Bunsen (sometime Prussian Ambassador in London) as our watchword and battle-cry, if we would assure the triumph of the Gospel in the modern world. "Translate," said he, "the Shemetic into the Japhetic." Too often, in fact, modern Christians speak an unknown tongue which is a fruitful cause of grievous mistakes and misunderstandings, just as in the past by a worship of the letter it created mythologies and dogmas fatal to the spread and fruition of the Gospel. The dialect of Canaan injures the influence of the Gospel and provides a ready handle to the mocking spirit. Your own Carlyle, in vigorous language that shook the intellectual torpor of the times, reminded us that each generation should fit its garment to its growth and invest the eternal truths in ever new and fresh forms, lest, being stereotyped in the expressions of another age, they become obscure and meaningless.

"Back to Jesus."

And lastly, Christian propaganda will not be successful unless it be animated by the spirit which has found utterance in the watchword, "Back to Jesus." The Religious Renaissance can only succeed in storming the gates of Hell if it is Christian. To neglect the living power and unique attraction of the commanding personality of Jesus of Nazareth would be to incur gratuitously a doom of barren abstraction. If the end and aim of all the efforts of Humanity is to realise in every sphere of its activity a sovereign idea, a joyful ideal, how can we ignore him who has been in himself the incarnation of the purest and intensest spiritual and moral life?

To return to the historical, living Christ does not necessarily involve the scrupulous assent, as of a Scribe, to all the details and features of that life as it has been transformed for us by the enthusiasm of the first witnesses.

Criticism may here and there constrain us to substitute a hard and strange reality for sweet and fascinating poetry. Why should we complain? Have we not evidences, in the historical portions of the Gospels, of a spiritual nature far more attractive than that pourtrayed for us by legend? Is not that the Rock on which we can base our unshaken conviction that we are not the dupes of imagination, and is it not a ground for joy that such a character belongs to our common humanity? It is no light gain to our poor race, the prey of so many gross passions, to discover in the life of one of its own children an image of what the race may be, of what it may become. Let us not be beguiled by a false mysticism, which, following in the wake of Catholic piety, ever on the outlook for apparitions of the Virgin, would venture to count on such apparitions of Christ and on his direct response to our immediate questions.

The Spirit, not the Letter.

In the enthusiasm and gratitude aroused in us by the labours of Christ we may lament that he is not in our very midst now, to solve the problems that weigh us down; and yet one of his most fervent disciples reports him as saying that it was profitable that he should go away. To escape from the barrenness of abstract questions it may indeed be wise to ask what Jesus would do if he were living here and now; but on this condition, that we do not let our question snare us into the wiles of spiritualism, remembering that if Jesus did come amongst us now, his first act would surely be to divest himself of the merely local and natural form under which he lived in the past, appearing no longer as a Jew or a Galilean but as a modern man; and we can have no better means of knowing what he would do to-day than by seeking through reflection and observation to discover what would be a faithful application of the principles he represented nineteen centuries ago. We ought to guard against supposing that the Christ of History would speak with the consciousness of a man of modern times, seeing that a thousand years of added experience and study have inevitably modified the modern man's point of view.

His true Humanity.

Instead, however, of exhausting our energies in barren endeavours to guess what the prophet of Nazareth would say, or what solutions he would advocate for our social needs, would it not be far more practical to bring to bear upon the industrial, political, and social conflicts and problems of the times the sentiments entertained by Jesus, and to draw the conclusions contained in germ in his teachings as to the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man? If we would attach to the Gospel the people who have sworn a Hannibalic oath against Catholicism, we must insist on the humanity of Jesus, and by so doing we shall but be following the example of the first Christians, who, in order to resist those gnostic tendencies that were reducing Christ to the condition of a phantom, insisted in their earliest declarations on the reality of the humanity of Jesus. We shall only be able to establish a successful propaganda among our contemporaries whom the assertions of dogmatism have revolted, on condition that we maintain that Jesus is not the object of Religion, but the subject of that Religion that was dimly emerging out of antiquity, and which eventually came to full bloom in this son of Israel. This Religion consists in basing man's trust in a principle of Supreme Love, trust that is in the Heavenly Father. To give us courage and comfort in our labours of spreading this gospel, I can recall nothing more suitable and efficacious than that noble exclamation of one of your martyrs, "Play the man, Master Ridley! we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England as I trust shall never be put out."

A TOUR TO KOLOZSVAR.

The day when we hope to see a large number of English friends in Kolozsvár is approaching fast. Let me say a few words to those who are already prepared to come, and also to those who have not yet made up their minds. I am not going to say that a journey even of one day's duration can be made without fatigue, therefore Transylvania cannot surely be seen without a considerable amount of trouble and effort; but all that belongs to those circumstances of an excursion which add a great deal to its pleasures and achievements. As myself one who is fond of travelling, I may say from experience, that if one is decided to reach an almost immeasurable distance, he does it with a greater ease than one day's journey for which he starts without a corresponding good spirit.

A tour to Kolozsvár is certainly long enough, but there are a great many attractions connected with it. A gentleman whom I met in Boston, U.S. America, told me last year that he had made several tours on the Continent, but if he can arrange it, he never misses Budapest, because no other town in Europe has that charm and beauty which is found there. Miss Tagart has already informed the excursionists that in Budapest you will meet friends and acquaintances. Mr. Jozan, Mrs. Korchmáros, whom you knew as Miss Buzogány, will meet you at Budapest, but I hope that Professor Kovács and myself may also be there. As a most important circumstance, let it be made known to all interested that the Transylvanian Karpathian Society has promised to procure us a separate railway carriage from Budapest to Transylvania and back at a moderate price. This carriage will be at the disposal of the company of excursionists, led by Miss Tagart, and it will mean a great addition to their comfort and ease.

One or two members of the Karpathian Society will travel with the party all the way as guides. It is intended to go from Budapest towards Arad, and reach Transylvania by railway on the Southern line, therefore near the southern branch of the Carpathian Mountains. There will be seen not only the finest mountain scenery possible, but also some very original costumes of people, and also the famous Castle of Hunyad (from the time of Matthias Hunyadi), and also the Castle of Déva, where Francis David died. By this route the towns of Torda and famous Torocztó may easily be seen. The party of excursionists will reach Kolozsvár on Sept. 5, and remain there until the 9th, in order to get a good rest, and also to see several things of interest. The beautiful college is fast approaching completion. I hope it will make a very good impression on our visitors. Bishop Ferencz and the Consistory, as well as the David Association and the Directors of the College, will do their best to make our English friends feel quite comfortable. Unfortunately our students will not be back yet, because the official opening has been unavoidably postponed to Sept. 22; therefore student life will be missed this time, but we hope that this will be repaid in some other way.

Let me just mention that Mrs. Korchmáros (Mary Buzogány) has written a very interesting letter to our Unitarian magazine, giving some information about Miss Tagart and her excursion.

We hope that all those who come to see us will be pleased; at least, we shall do our best to make them feel so. Let me express our very great joy and hearty welcome to all. George Boros.

Kolozsvár, Aug. 4.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

Sir,—I should be glad to remind your readers that we start for Hungary on Friday, Aug. 23. Several ministers, Mr. Shrubsole, and some of the ladies of our Committee are of the party. There are, however, still five vacancies which we should like to see filled. Those who might be deterred by the ordinary expenses and the difficulties of the Hungarian language would do well to avail themselves of this unique opportunity of visiting our hospitable Unitarian brethren in this distant part of Europe and seeing many interesting and beautiful places on the way. A sum of £14 must be paid beforehand, and the tickets are available for forty-five days, but the tour is only planned to last three weeks, which a total sum of from £18 to £20 will cover.

L. M. Tagart.

The August number of The Coming Day contains the address given by the Rev. J. Page Hopps at that remarkable service held in the Free Christian Church on Sunday afternoon, July 14, for "The Croydon Labour Representatives," of which we recently published a report; also Mr. Hopps's welcome into the ministry to the students who left the Home Missionary College in Manchester last June.

We talk to God, that is prayer. God talks to us, that is inspiration.—Lyman Abbott.

OBITUARY.

MRS. RICHARD ORAM.

Many of our readers will share our deep regret at the announcement of the death of Mrs. Oram, sen., of Cremyll, Wandsworth Common. Up till a few weeks ago she was in her usual health, being quite vigorous despite her seventy-five years, and left home for Newquay, Cornwall, to enjoy a holiday. She was only there a short time before she was seized with an illness which was from the first alarming, and ultimately proved fatal. She died at Newquay, Aug. 2. The funeral took place Aug. 7, a service which was largely attended being held at Christ Church, Devonport, and the interment taking place at Plymouth Cemetery. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, officiated. Mrs. Oram's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Gould, of Devonport, were among the founders of the congregation in that town, and their attachment to Unitarian principles were fully inherited by their daughter. She married Mr. Richard Oram, naval instructor, and found in him an ardent supporter of the faith, and the Devonport church owes much to them. Mr. Oram died twenty years ago, and she then came to London to live, though retaining a close connection with the town of her birth. The Wandsworth congregation, which has had her warm support since its beginning, will miss her greatly, and the cause of Unitarianism generally has lost in her a loyal and consistent friend. She attended the Twentieth Century meetings this year, and fully enjoyed their inspiration and the presence of a host of friends. Her son, Dr. R. R. W. Oram, of Wandsworth, is the last of her four children.

THE INWARD LIFE.

If inward order is our real good, if heaven is within, if our eternal life is our spiritual life, if everything may disappoint except the harvest in the soul, if this is the only success that God guarantees—then, "Oh that I might fly away, and be at rest!" is a prayer forbidden to us all. We must make peace where we are, sanctify the ground on which we stand, glorify the Lord our God on earth, and justify His Providence where He has placed us.

But the thirst for happiness is not for nothing. Restless desires point to a fulfilment. There is one hunger and thirst that God has promised to satisfy; yet it is a hunger and a thirst that will never end, and will for ever grow. "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." But great tendencies, if not allowed their right direction, will manifest themselves irregularly, wed themselves to some poor necessity of our nature that cannot bear their illimitable strain, and so mercifully shatter our false life. And even when we are seeking our true life, we must look for it where we are, not where we are not. To forego the Lord's Prayer—the doing of God's Will, the coming of God's Kingdom now and here; to be always setting our eyes and hopes on the future and the distant—what is this but taking the soft wings of the dove, and flying away from the only real difficulty, the only real work, which is to build up the Kingdom of Heaven within, strengthening all the spiritual elements, affections that know where their true nourishment is and refuse to feed on accidents, delight and confidence in truth with adequate search for it, personal intercourse with goodness and trust in its living source, fellowship with all suffering through the charity of a common nature, one brotherhood through one Fatherhood, the desire and effort to make ourselves better men, larger in spirit, in thought, in wisdom, in knowledge, in emotion, in patience, in the power of beneficent action, in faithfulness to the opportunities of doing good which God, who knows where He is leading us, casts in our way? We shall never know any better heaven so long as we neglect this; and we shall not escape the necessity of the gradual approaches of faithfulness in present and in little things, by looking to another life on whose coming blessedness we presume, with no roots of its blessedness in us from which we are living and growing now. There is at least a spiritual parable in the poetry of Scripture, that the dove let loose over the wide waste found no place to rest the sole of her foot, and returned and rested in the Ark of God. And even the most aged man whose earthly ark and tabernacle are most clearly dissolving away, and the abating waters bringing very near to a renovated world, rests any real hope not on change of scene, or of love, or of interest, but in yet more of fellowship with that God who was ever with him, and who in goodness and mercy has followed him all the days of his life.—John Hamilton Thom.

Open, Lord, my inward ear,
And bid my heart rejoice!
Bid my quiet spirit hear
Thy comfortable voice;
Never in the whirlwind found,
Or where earthquakes rock the place;
Still and silent is the sound,
The whisper of thy grace!

From the world of sin, and noise,
And hurry, I withdraw;
For the small and inward voice
I wait with humble awe:
Silent am I now and still;
Dare not in thy presence move:
To my waiting soul reveal
The secret of thy love!

—Charles Wesley.

Four years ago members of the Society of Friends held a very successful Summer School at Scarborough, from Aug. 4 to 18. This year, in the same vigorous atmosphere, they have established for five weeks a "Settlement for Bible Study." Even classes in Hebrew and Greek Testament are offered, while Professor Adeney is lecturing on "The Four Gospels in the Light of Recent Research," Mr. Buchanan Gray, of Mansfield College, on "Priesthood in the Old Testament," Dr. Rufus M. Jones, of Haverford College, Pennsylvania, on "The Mystical Element in Paul and John," and on "Epochs of Christian Thought," and Mr. Edward Grubb, M.A. the new editor of the British Friend, on "Outlines of the Teaching of Jesus," and on "Commerce and Christianity." Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, Mr. J. W. Graham, Mr. J. S. Rowntree, and Dr. Rendel Harris are also among the lecturers. The work of the Settlement extends from Aug. 4 to Sept. 7, and we trust that the rich feast offered will be enjoyed to the full.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Message of the Flowers.

When I was in the country some weeks ago, I saw a magnificent rose-tree, which grew up the side of a house, spreading its branches far and wide. It was the sort called La Gloire de Dijon, the flower a yellowish white and with a delicious scent. In the season this particular tree is loaded with roses, the delight not only of those who own it, but of everyone who passes by.

On a certain morning, in one corner of this wonderful little rose world, you might have seen one old rose, which had been in bloom a long time, and a number of others round it, some just opening, some rather more fully open, but all young and joyous, save one poor little thing that had been stricken by disease and was blighted.

But more than that, if you had sat still and attentive underneath, and opened the ears of your heart you might have heard them talking. The sun was shining brightly, the butterflies, some white, some blue, some red and black, were flying from flower to flower, the bees were buzzing happily as they sought for honey, the birds were singing in the leafy branches of the trees, and a lark hidden from sight in the deep blue of heaven.

"How beautiful the world is!" cried one rose joyfully.

"How warm and jolly the sunshine!" chimed in a second.

"And the wind is so soft and gentle," said a third. "I do love him when he's in a good humour like this."

"And our friends the butterflies, always smiling and happy, bring us messages of love from our relatives who live far away," exclaimed a fourth.

"Oh, it is good to be alive this bright June morning," they sang in a chorus out of very joy, while they gaily danced on their stems, and filled the air with delicious fragrance.

Then one of them turned to the old rose—"What a long time you must have lived! Have you been as happy as this all the while?"

But before she could reply another asked: "Shall we all live as long and be happy?"

The old rose smiled. "I can't say I have never been unhappy. Look there," and she caused them to look at the poor little bud that was too weak and ill to take part in their pleasant talk and play, and would never be beautiful like them. In their own pleasure they had lost sight of this little crippled sister. Then they were sad because they had forgotten her, and because she could certainly not live very long, and they knew they could do nothing for her. Before, however, they were able to say how sorry they were the old rose went on—

"But I never feel unhappy now."

"What! not on account of our little sister?" they asked. It seemed a hard-hearted thing to say.

"No; not even for her. Of course, I should like to see her strong and well. But I am quite sure she has her place in the word as well as we, and some message to deliver from the great God who made us all. See how patient and uncomplaining she is. I know she teaches me a beautiful lesson, and I am very thankful to her."

The sick flower, although she was suffering a great deal of pain, looked up and smiled.

"How kind of you to comfort me," she whispered. "I am so glad I can do a little good. I sometimes feel I must be very useless, and that is worse than the pain."

And then they all made up their minds that she should never feel that again, because it wasn't really true. They would show her how much they loved her, and put some of the brightness of their lives into hers, if they could.

But while they were thinking that the old rose startled them by saying:

"After all, you know, although she is so ill she will live longer than most, if not all, of you."

"What!" they cried all together, "live longer than we! How can she? Why, see how strong and healthy we are." And they would have laughed aloud at the foolish thing the wise old rose had said, but that it would have seemed unkind to their little sister.

"Oh!" said the old rose, "you are healthy enough to live as long as I have, perhaps longer. But that is not all you have to fear. There—look!"

And down below them they saw a queer big creature moving about, not quickly like a butterfly, but slowly and making a dreadful noise as he walked, and every now and then he took hold of a rose, and with something that flashed in the sunlight, severed it from its stalk.

"A man," said the old rose. "Perhaps your turn will come to-morrow."

"Horrible! Horrible!" they cried, thoroughly frightened. "Can't we escape anyhow?"

The old rose smiled again.

"You ought to have been born quite at the top. Then, perhaps, he would not have taken the trouble to get at you. Here, he is sure to. But don't be afraid. When you hear what I can tell you, you will not want to escape. Listen. When I was as young as you I had a great number of brothers and sisters of about the same age. A few of them died early on the tree; most of them were cut off and taken away by a man like this one. When the first went we were all frightened too, but afterwards, as soon as we understood, we were very glad, and each hoped that his turn would come next. None had to wait long, except me. Why I was left I don't know. I am certainly no happier than the others. But perhaps it was that I might tell you why you have nothing to fear."

"Oh, do tell us," they said.

"The first lot that were cut sent word to us as soon as ever they could——"

"But," broke in one of the other roses, "how could they when they were taken far away?"

"Oh," answered the old rose, "that is easy enough. Sometimes it's a butterfly, more often the wind which can go everywhere and knows everything. In this case it was the wind."

"And what did he say?"

"Oh, he came laughing and happy, and made us very glad. He told us how a young lady, named Mary, who lives in that big red place you can see, which they call a house, tied them up together beautifully, talking to them all the time, telling them how lovely they looked, and how sweet they smelt, and how happy they were going to make Jimmy. Then she took them out with her. And at first they were disappointed and miserable, for she went through dark and dirty streets, where they found it difficult to breathe. They felt stifled and ill, and asked one another how people could live in such nasty places, and wished they were back in the old garden. But soon they found themselves being taken into a small house which, although it was very grimy outside, was sweet and clean within, so that once there they felt well and cheerful again, and wondered what would happen next.

"'How's Jimmy?' Mary asked.

"'Oh, Miss, I'm afraid he's very ill indeed,' Jimmy's mother answered. 'Doctor says he can never get well again.' And she began to cry, because she dearly loved her boy, who was dying. When Mary went into his bedroom and saw his little white face, whiter than the bedclothes, and his little shrunken hands, she knew that Jimmy would soon be playing with the angels on the beautiful meadows of heaven.

"'Jimmy, I've brought you a few flowers. I know you like them. You were always fond of roses, weren't you?'

"Jimmy's face brightened. He loved flowers, although he had never been able to get many to grow in the dark little street he lived in. His large eyes looked at her and smiled, seeming to say, 'How good of you to come and see me and bring me such beautiful flowers,' but he had only strength to whisper faintly, 'Thank you, Miss.' Before she left Mary put the roses in a glass quite close to the bedside; and after she had gone they were able to talk to him, and what he heard them say was: 'Jimmy, don't you be afraid. Our dear God loves us all. He has sent us to say that He loves you very dearly, and to cheer you up; and He says we may go with you when you die. Oh, it will be so beautiful.' And Jimmy wasn't a bit afraid, he grew quite happy; and my brother and sister roses were very happy too, because they had been able to comfort and put in good heart the little sufferer who was soon going to die. There," said the old rose, "wouldn't you like to speak your message like that?"

"Yes, indeed we would," they all answered.

(To be continued.)

Messrs. P. S. King and Son (Orchard House, Westminster) have in the press, for publication during September, a work by Dr. J. F. J. Sykes, on "Public Health and Housing," being the Milroy lectures delivered before the Royal College of Physicians in February and March last. The lectures have been carefully revised by the author, and many additions made which it has been considered would add to the completeness of the subject. The work is divided into three parts:—(1) The Ascertained Effects upon Health of Certain Conditions of Habitation; (2) Construction and Misconstruction; and (3) Usage and Misusage. A number of illustrations and statistical tables are included, and the whole work should prove most valuable to those interested in such an important subject as the Public Health in relation to Housing.

Let us not desert our own work, our own God within, to gaze after a pattern like our neighbour's, neither to seek to make his gift ours.—Emilie Cady.

ON DERWENTWATER.

AN APPEAL.

In this holiday month even those who are still held prisoners in town have visions of mountain solitudes, of open moorlands, of woods and meadows, where the broad rivers flow, or of the level sands, the rocky coast, and the ever-changing glories of the sea. Tens of thousands of happy people have gone forth, to be at least in the fresh air, away from the stress and turmoil of the town, to rest after months of strenuous work, to enjoy some new pursuit or the absolute quiet of a well-earned idleness that is content simply to be in the country, and let its calm, refreshing influences do their own work. One sees them from afar, on the hill-side or on the shore, rejoicing in the great summer exodus, counting those the wisest or most fortunate who have found their way into the loneliest places, most remote from the conventions and the many distracting claims of our crowded life, where, in all that makes for health and the purest joy, Nature reigns supreme.

Our islands are happy indeed in a wealth of natural beauty, given in such variety and within so small a compass to few countries in the world. There are tracts of glorious mountain country or hilly moorland, wood, or common, or invigorating coast, within the reach of everyone. But the dense population, the unceasing growth of towns, the raids of builders on the most unexpected places, constantly threaten the destruction of some part of this natural wealth, which thus on the spiritual side becomes of priceless worth with the growing pressure of the more sordid elements of our common life. This makes the wise among our people very jealous to preserve all that is possible of the uninvaded solitudes and the unspoilt beauty of the land, and especially to secure what is greatest and most beautiful as a national possession, for the full and free enjoyment of all alike.

This summer a rare opportunity was offered for securing as such a national possession an estate amid some of the loveliest scenery in England. Derwentwater is in the heart of the Lake District, and perhaps the loveliest of the lakes. No greater treasure of this priceless kind could be given to the people than freedom to enjoy the hill-side and the wooded shore of this quiet lake, with the wonderful mountain views that it commands. The Brandlehow Park Estate, of, roughly speaking, 108 acres, lies along the sloping ground under Catbells, between Hawse End and Brandlehow. It stretches from the shores of the lake to the road which borders the unenclosed common of Catbells, and has about a mile of frontage on the lake. It is well wooded, and its great charm was known to Southey, who constantly took his water parties across to Otterbield Bay, which forms the northern end of the property. The views of the lake, of Skiddaw, Blencathra, and St. Herbert's Island, as seen from the grounds, are very beautiful. This estate the National Trust has now the option for six months of purchasing. Its appeal for subscriptions to this end, which we read first in the Spectator of May 11, and from which the above particulars as to the estate are taken, points out that at present the shores of Derwentwater are entirely in the hands of private owners, and there are only three or four public landing-places, so that the purchase of this estate for the nation will not only secure the grounds from the wood-cutter's axe and the speculative builder, but will free a whole mile of the western shore for the public.

The present owner of the estate has made his offer out of sympathy with the objects of the National Trust, and the amount required is £7,000.

Subscriptions or promises may be sent to :—

Sir Robert Hunter, Chairman, Reform Club, Pall-mall, S.W.; Canon Rawnsley, Hon. Sec., Crosthwaite Vicarage, Keswick; Miss Octavia Hill, 190, Marylebone-road, London, N.W.; Miss H. Yorke, Hon. Treasurer, 190, Marylebone-road, London, N.W.; the Secretary, National Trust, 1, Great College-street, Westminster. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "National Provincial Bank of England."

In the Spectator of July 27, a letter was published from Miss Octavia Hill reporting the progress of the scheme, and further emphasising the appeal. As we desire very warmly to commend the scheme to the attention of all lovers of the Lake country, and all sympathisers with the object of the Trust, we cannot do better than reproduce here the greater part of Miss Hill's letter :—

The National Trust has now secured more than half the money, and donations are daily coming in; but the time during which the option of purchase is open is quickly passing, and the amount still to be collected is very large—£3,460. London is emptying fast. May I through your columns ask those who are going, or have gone, to mountain, lake, and moor for their own holiday to send some contribution towards securing for others this lovely slope of mountain, meadow, and wood, that it may be for ever open freely to all who need rest and who care for views of lake and hill and sky? We do not plead for it as we might for help in famine or pestilence, but there is a hunger of the soul and mind and heart as well as of the body; and it is for ever true that to make a healthy life one must have rest as well as work. We do not live by bread alone; the Sunday rest is as necessary to man as the weekly toil. We all feel the need, and that increasingly, of fair places where the flowers grow and there is sight of sky and hill. We are a rich nation, and surely we should each do what in us lies to secure places such as this for the large number of those who yearly escape from our towns to the country, and who do not visit those possessing parks and grounds, and who yearly find accessible ground more built over and enclosed. But more than this, the Lake District is an inheritance of our nation, fair and still, and haunted by memories of our great men. Whoever has learnt from Ruskin and Wordsworth should try to preserve for their countrymen some of the beauties which moulded and taught them to be what they were. This land, too, is a great living picture, and from it one beholds other great pictures. One may see Skiddaw rise against the sky, and the mists gather blue in the recesses of Borrowdale, hear the wavelets brake against the shore, watch the squirrel at his play, and see the masses of tall foxgloves on the hillside, while treading the winding wood-paths, or the mountain meadow on the side of Catbells. Are we to keep this for our people or not? It depends upon us each and all. Will you each in your measure help? We have committees in Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and Keswick, the working men are subscribing, we are issuing cards to those who will collect shillings, we have made the scheme known in the hotels and banks in the district, we have written to America, ever ready as she is to unite with us in appreciation of these common inheritances of our race. We have received £3,540 in donations varying from 5s. to £500, but the amount to raise is large, the time is short; committees and notices and letters to papers do not purchase land; it is you, the potential donors, with whom it rests whether this year a mile of the shore of Derwentwater is saved as a possession for English people or not. I doubt whether much of the money we this year spend will do so deep and lasting good as that which forms our share of the mile of mountain meadow slope on Derwentwater.

We are glad to hear that since Miss Octavia Hill's letter was published the promised donations have amounted to £4,000, and we most earnestly hope that the remaining £3,000 required will be forthcoming before it is too late.

TWO WAYS OF MEETING TROUBLE.*

BY THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."—Matt. vi. 34.

"Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is."—Psalms xxxix. 4.

WHEN we see persons who have borne very bravely some heavy burden, we ask them to tell us the secret of their endurance. When we ask, we have two different answers. There are those who take a lofty tone. They say that there is but one way by which a man may meet the trials that come to him. He must learn to rise above them. In the finite there is sorrow and disappointment, in the infinite there is peace; above the realm of the struggle there is a realm of serene thought and life. It is as if one were in the narrow streets of some great city. All about him men are struggling for existence, crowding one another, lying and cheating, little children are starving, pale mothers are struggling through the long hours for a scanty crust of bread. This, the man says, is life; this is all there is—this hateful, sordid struggle.—And then one comes and takes him by the hand and leads him up some great tower, and he looks out and sees the larger world. Below him is the strife of the city and its ceaseless agony. He sees that the city itself is but a little place; it is environed by the green hills, and far away he can see the gleam of the summer sea. Below him there are dark alleys where the sunshine never reaches, but the man on the tower knows that it is not because Nature is niggardly. Nature is prodigal of its gifts. The sunshine is over the land. It may be that some suffer and starve, but wonderful is the abundance of life and gladness that he sees. So he takes heart, and calmness comes as he gets that larger view. It does not matter very much of what materials a landscape may be made, every landscape is beautiful if we can only see enough of it. A man travelling over a desert feels only the discomfort of it all, but there comes a time, at sunset, when, from some summit, he looks out over the path along which he has come, and then looks beyond to the great mountains that lure him onward, and all that desert landscape is transfigured before him. No happy valley full of corn and wine could be so beautiful as this in the light reflected from the bare rocks and gleaming sand. He looks beyond. There are the delectable mountains in the light of the setting sun. No picture of perfect peace could come to him like that peace of the desert.

There are those who help us in just that way, not by showing us a new world, not by telling us of compensations elsewhere for what we lose here, but purely by the loftiness of their nature, and the wideness of their views. They show us the grandeur of the whole where we had only seen the misery of the part, and they tell us that no matter what the day may bring forth, they look beyond to the years and to the ages; they look beyond the individual, with his seeming failure, to the universe, and in that wider view is peace.

That kind of peace comes whenever we get a view of that which is, in its nature and in its extent, wonderful. It brings to us a sense of the sublime. So it was with Marcus Aurelius. He tells us no new gospel. It is a familiar world he looks upon; but with what calm eyes he looks upon it, how far from fretfulness his soul is as it takes in the sweep of human history and realises how petty are the ills of the individual as he compares them with the greatness of the whole. He teaches us how to measure our days.

A modern poet tells us to look away from the little things around us, and find our help in the great spaces that are about us:—

Ye heavens whose pure dark regions have no sign
Of langour, though so calm, and though so great,
Are yet untroubled and impassionate;
. . . You remain
A world above man's head, to let him see
How boundless might his soul's horizons be,
How vast, yet of what clear transparency,
How it were good to live there and breathe free,—
How fair a lot to fill
Is left to each man still.

That is the substance of a very manly philosophy, which has satisfied not a few of the greatest and best of our race; and it comes to us, always telling us to look away from that which is partial, that which is temporary, and see everything in the large outlines of ultimate reality—to get above the moment, to look out upon the eternity in which we live.

These helpers of ours do not ever try to minimise our sorrows, they rather try to magnify them before our eyes; but in magnifying them they magnify also the power of the soul to resist and to endure. It is a great thing, they say, to live nobly, a great thing to bear the inevitable without repining. It requires all the hidden strength of the soul to thus endure.

No man's spirit can thus face the whole of life, learning truly to measure himself against the realities that are around him, without growing in strength. Do not, they say, cherish illusions. Do not seek to distract the soul with little things. Meet the difficulty, and then you will first be able to overcome it.

What heroic thought there is in Browning when he speaks of the last great mystery:—

I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forebore,
And bade me creep past.
No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
The heroes of old.

(ii.) There is need of heroic temper. Those who reach it are worthy of all praise. And yet many persons—most of us, in fact—do not reach that. There are many who do not dare to look at what they themselves must inevitably endure, yet who learn to bear patiently and gladly that which comes. They do not ask to taste the whole of life, but, little by little, day by day, they sip from the cup, till at length, before they know it, it is drained of its bitterness. They taste the bitter with the sweet. They make no complaining. They take the day as it comes, not anticipating that which must come after it. And at last when all is over, we say these people have lived beautiful lives, they have lived simply, sweetly, trustfully. And we turn from the heroic attitude. Admiring it as we must, we still have sympathy with Charles Lamb when he tells us that the secret of his endurance of sorrows which many men have found too heavy to be borne was that he learned "to take short views." There were some things in his own life which he could not look at steadily; but day by day he found blessed distractions, and turned from sorrow towards those things which were beautiful and lovable. Day by day he learned how many things there are, even in the saddest life, to be done, how much to be loved, how much to be enjoyed. The whole of it he could not taste. Each part of it he could taste. Each day's duty could be done.

When we think of that brave man of genius, Cervantes, enduring so many misfortunes as slave, as soldier, and as starving man of letters, do we not come to love him all the more because, to the last, he refuses to brood upon those things and to enlarge them to his imagination? How delightful the story written on his deathbed of the student whom he met upon the road and who told him that his disease was incurable. "'Yes,' I answered, 'many have told me the same thing. To judge by the quickness of my pulse I cannot live longer than next Saturday. You have made acquaintance with me at an unfortunate time, as I shall not live to show gratitude for your great kindness.' Such was our conversation as we arrived at the bridge of Toledo. He spurred his horse and left me, after I had embraced him anew. He had, however, supplied my pen with ample material for pleasantry."

Who shall say that that showed shallowness of soul, that that was the coward's attitude?—though all the time it was the little things that interested the man rather than the great things.

(iii.) And yet one must feel that there may be a nobler and a wiser attitude than either that of the man who, ignoring the little things of daily life, fixes his mind altogether on what he esteems the great and eternal realities, or that of the man who dismisses the greater things that he may live with short views of the life of the present day.

I believe that it is possible for one to take the larger views, to ponder deeply on the solemn miracle of life; and then, having in some wise taken the measure of his days and learned what it is, to come back with all simplicity and singleness of heart to the little things. When he sees them in their true relations he will recognise in them the quality that belongs to eternity.

That is what comes to us in any great crisis. To every one of us there must come some time when the whole tenor of our lives is changed. We stand upon some eminence, and look back and see the familiar faces and the familiar places, remembering all the careless joy that belonged to those days that are past; and then we say, All this is ended for us. Whatever the future brings it cannot recall what is past. Our friends of long ago have passed away, the old thoughts that filled our minds can never satisfy us again. Then we look forward, and see stretching before us a new kind of life, dreary, it may be, lonely and unfamiliar. Along this road we must henceforth walk, and the very dignity of the soul demands that every such crisis should be met, that we should realise it, that we should try to take the measure of it, and ask ourselves what we must be, what we must do under these new circumstances. But it does not follow that we should carry always with us this consciousness until it burdens us, and until we lose the joy of life; because we have to learn another lesson. We go into an unknown land, but in this land we must make our home; here must be new fellowships, new experiences; there must be much talk by the way with those whom we meet, kindly greetings exchanged. These days are not to be overshadowed by only one great thought, they are days to be filled little by little. In the new interests we must live. And, so after we have taken the measure of these days that are to come, that other word comes to us —"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It may be a great burden which we have to bear, but we do not have to bear it all at once.

He who would live the strong and happy life must combine these two thoughts. He must take the comprehensive view which gives meaning and dignity to all things, and then he must learn that the great work must be accomplished by slow degrees. He cannot accomplish everything by one heroic resolution. He must take things as they come. He must enjoy the short views. He must do the duty that lies nearest him. Thus the full days go by, and before he fully realises, the task which seemed so great has been accomplished.

THE COPENHAGEN MOVEMENT.

THE readers of THE INQUIRER will no doubt be interested in a brief report of what I saw and heard of the movement of our friends at Copenhagen. Contrary to previous anticipation I landed in that city on the morning of July 21, sufficiently early to repair to the hall of the Students' Club and attend the service at ten o'clock. I was told that the congregation would be very small, so many being out of town. We numbered about forty, mostly well-to-do and cultivated people. The service began with the singing of two psalms by the choir, few of the congregation joining. The preacher was Pastor Uffe Birkedal, a man apparently approaching fifty of an intellectual cast of countenance. He spoke quietly but very rapidly, and I was unable to follow him, to my great disappointment. At the close of the service he introduced me and kindly invited me to say a few words. He himself is much beloved and held in deep respect, though his deafness is a constant impediment to his work.

But the more interesting experience was on Wednesday evening, when a public meeting was held to hear an address from me on "The Gospel of Christ in the Twentieth Century," and an address on "Religious Tolerance" by Pastor Anton Jensen. My ear had now become sufficiently attuned to enable me to understand most of what was said by Pastor Jensen, by Pastor Birkedal, who introduced us, and by Herr Brandstrup, the chairman of the Free Church Association.

Though it was a sultry summer evening there were from two to three hundred persons present, and the attention throughout was close and earnest. I need not report my own speech, but I wish I could convey the impression made on me by Anton Jensen. A young man of military bearing—formerly in the army—he held for a short time the pulpit at Harboöre, a small fishing-town on the western coast. His heresies, however, soon brought him under the notice of the authorities, and his bishop inhibited him from preaching unless he would publicly retract his heresies from the pulpit—which, of course, he refused to do. His case has aroused the greatest interest throughout Denmark. He is essentially a fighting man, full of courage, moral indignation, and a burning desire to preach to the poor a purer gospel than that current in the pulpits of the land. His speech was full of fire, and was a passionate plea for a forward movement, and for the proclamation of the message of a Free Christianity, unbound by dogma, to the people. It contained one passage at least of rare eloquence and beauty, in which he inveighed against the cruelty of leaving the poor man to climb with bleeding feet by the mountain way while the enlightened Christian goes by the smooth road of a purer gospel. He denounced the easy tolerance which leaves a cruel gospel to preach its message of blood and fire without remonstrance or rebuke. The gentler spirits among our friends, while honouring the courage and sincerity of the militant young heretic, shrink from his war-like methods, and believe that a more peaceful and conciliatory attitude will make more truly and surely for the Kingdom of God.

It is difficult for us in England to appreciate and understand the problem that lies before our friends, whether to withdraw from the National Church or not. Suffice it to say that the problem in no way resembles any problem of conformity or nonconformity in England. The act of withdrawal from the Church is a personal act, and consists in notifying that the individual will henceforth allocate the tax he has hitherto paid to his parish clergyman either to one of the recognised outside sects or to the parish school. This act at once deprives the citizen of the claim to the ministrations of the Church in baptism, marriage, or burial. The attendance at services voluntarily provided—as in the case of our friends—instead of the ordinary services of the People's Church in no way affects the status of the citizen as a member of that Church. I understand that Pastor Birkedal and others are opposed to any renunciation of the rights of churchmanship, and hope to obtain such concessions as will enable Free Christian ministers to use their own formularies for baptism, marriage, and burial within the communion of the People's Church. It does not appear that, if this concession can be won, there would be any ethical objection to the retention by our friends of their churchmanship, to which they are bound by ties of tradition and affection not lightly to be set aside.

I came away with a greatly deepened interest in the movement, with affectionate gratitude in my heart to the friends who are so deeply interested in the progress of religious truth and freedom, and who made my visit so delightful, and with a profound assurance that they have a truly great and noble work in hand on which we may all pray for the blessing of God.

NOTES FROM DENMARK.

WHEN, in the year 1849, the Danish people regained the political freedom of which they had been deprived for almost 200 years — the Danish King during that period having been almost as autocratic as the Czar of the present day — the affairs of the Church, liberated from the sway of one single man, were delivered up into the hands of the Government—that is, the Houses of Parliament (the Rigsdag) and the King's Cabinet.

The written Constitution (the Grundlov) guarantees the people religious freedom, but at the same time decrees that "the Evangelical-Lutheran Church is the Danish People's Church (Folkekirken), and as such supported by the State." Further, the Grundlov states the right of all Danish subjects to form associations for the purpose of worshipping God according to their individual conviction; and other religious communities, such as the Catholic, the Jewish, etc., are by the State recognised as independent churches, and as such endowed with the same legal rights as the People's Church.

The Grundlov promises the People's Church its own constitution. This promise has not yet been fulfilled; so that the People's Church is still in a state of development favourable to any kind of reform. Several important laws bearing on church organization have, however, been passed; and foremost among these, those by which in 1855 and 1868 the formation of free congregations inside the Church is made legal. Up to those dates every member of the People's Church was a compulsory member of his parish congregation, whereas at the present day every man has a right, independent of his place of residence, to choose the congregation he may like to belong to and subscribe to; and any body of men may choose their own minister,* and form a congregation, which, on certain conditions, shall be recognised as a member of the People's Church, and, with the exception of material support from the State, hold the same position and legal rights as the parish congregations.

One of the conditions indispensable for obtaining this recognition is that the minister chosen should be an ordained man, and as such have taken the minister's vow (Præstelöftet). By this vow the minister solemnly pledges himself to preach "the word of God, pure and simple, as it is found in the Apostolic writings (Symbolum), in the Augsburg Confession, and in Luther's 'Small Catechism.'"

The wish to change this vow for one less binding to dogmas and creeds has for some time been strongly developing inside the Church, and when last winter a young clergyman was deprived of his living, because on many points he held and preached Unitarian views, many voices were raised by the clergy, in public as well as in private, for what was called a greater freedom in teaching (Lœrefrihed), the most radical among these even going to the length of claiming for the ministers of the Church the right to preach the gospel unhampered by creeds and doctrines, according to their personal conviction and faith. That such a proposition should raise a storm of opposition is only natural. By far the greater part of the clergy, including the seven bishops of the country, vindicated the principle that no man who does not believe in Christ as God, and as the miraculously appointed Saviour of fallen humanity, can be termed a Christian, or allowed to hold a pulpit in the People's Church.

Nevertheless this spring a religious association, numbering eminent orthodox men, clerical as well as lay, addressed an application to the Cultus Minister (the Cabinet Minister who represents the highest authority in all questions bearing on the temporal management of the Church) that the minister's vow henceforth should be replaced by a simple declaration of a more liberal undogmatic character.

The Cultus Minister in his answer to this application admitted that it was desirable that a greater freedom should be accorded to the ministers as teachers of religion, but at the same time maintained that any vow or declaration which, as the one proposed, left so great a scope for individual interpretation of the Gospel that it could hardly be said to be bound by any creed or doctrines, would be detrimental to the People's Church as a religious institution, and would therefore not be taken into consideration by him.

What will be the next step taken by the Liberal clergy is not known. Probably the question will soon be raised again, as the Conservative Cabinet has in these days been replaced by a Liberal one.

Under the conditions here shortly explained, we—the Danish Unitarians—have two alternatives to choose between. We may make up our minds to leave the People's Church, and try to be legally recognised as an independent church like that of the Catholics or the Methodists, or we may decide to abide in the People's Church, awaiting whatever result may come of the Liberal movement roused inside that church itself. By the formation of the first Unitarian congregation—the Free Church Association—we took a step which might lead us either way. The last general meeting has, however, temporarily settled the question by deciding in favour of the second alternative. So that the work which is now before us—besides and above the struggle for what may be termed our daily existence as a congregation, difficulties such as how to christen our children, how to bury our dead, where to get our ministers and how to provide the means for supporting them, arising from day to day—the task we have set ourselves is, whenever and wherever we may be called upon to do so, honestly and fearlessly to profess our faith and claim for ourselves a place in our People's Church.

We cannot clearly see the ways and means by which we may have to proceed; we will not peevishly dwell on the dangers and difficulties that may be in store for us. Our hearts are not light, but we humbly hope and trust that we may be given strength, manfully, faithfully and lovingly to serve, according to our means, the great cause of Truth in the path we have chosen to walk. LITERATURE.

DEISSMANN'S "BIBLE STUDIES."*

IT is difficult within the limits of a short notice to give anything like an adequate account of this book. We may begin by expressing the conviction that it inaugurates a new epoch in the study of the New Testament, nor do we fear that any careful student of the work will be inclined to think the estimate exaggerated. It opens with an instructive essay on the distinction between "letters" which are addressed to a person or a number of persons in lieu of the spoken word, never being intended for publication, and "epistles" which are treatises assuming the form of letters as a literary device. Manifestly we cannot expect to find "letters" properly so-called used and quoted in contemporary literature. It is only when "letters" become, per accidens, public property, and so attain a position never contemplated by the original writer, that we can expect to find them exerting wide or general influence. Dr. Deissmann believes that this distinction explains the fact that no use is made of St. Paul's "letters" in the Acts of the Apostles. The volume closes with a number of short essays on various matters connected with the history of the Septuagint and the New Testament. But it is the middle part of the volume which is most valuable and striking. It consists of notes, some of which are elaborate and full, on the vocabulary and grammar of the New Testament. Dr. Deissmann believes that no clear line of demarcation can be drawn between the language of the New Testament and other contemporary Greek. Everybody knows that it was, and is to some extent still, the fashion to explain peculiarities of New Testament language as Hebraisms. Dr. Deissmann rejects such explanations except for portions of the New Testament which are obviously translations from a Hebrew or Aramaic original, or again for quotations from the Septuagent. He proves his point by producing in abundance exact parallels to alleged Hebraisms from the Greek of papyri and inscriptions which belong to the Alexandrian era.

Perhaps the most brilliant and, at the same time, convincing example of Dr. Deissmann's method will be found in the treatment of Heb. vi. 14. It has been generally believed that the form of oath used there is a curious amalgam of Hebrew and Greek construction. This plausible view is rendered henceforth impossible by the papyri. The form is no specific phenomenon of Jewish or Biblical Greek, and we must either regard the use of ἐι for ἢ as an itacism or else content ourselves with the observation that the expression is a form of oath which prevailed in Egypt without venturing to explain its origin. Some of the information given is of a wider kind, and more closely connected with theology. It is shown, for example, that the word ἀγάπη is not merely "Biblical," and that "brother" was a technical term in Serapeum of Memphis for the member of a religious guild. Again, proof is given that in the Greek of Egypt "presbyter" was a title used as a distinctive appellation of priest. It is hardly necessary to point out that this use of language may have smoothed the road for the identification of priest and presbyter in the later Church.

We must ask our readers to take these as a few samples from this most striking and important work. It is valuable and original from beginning to end. We will only add that the translation and the excellent indices reflect the highest credit on Mr. Grieve's careful and accomplished scholarship. W. E. ADDIS.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE most attractive article in this month's reviews we have found is that by Mr. Leslie Stephen in the Monthly Review, "In Praise of Walking." It is an eloquent, charmingly humorous, and whimsical, celebration of the secure delights to be found in that most simple and natural of recreations. From the time of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson to the present day Mr. Stephen tells of what walking has been to some of the best and most notable of men.

Wesley is generally credited with certain moral reforms, but one secret of his power is not always noticed. In his early expeditions he went on foot to save horse hire, and made the great discovery that twenty or thirty miles a day was a wholesome allowance for a healthy man. The fresh air and exercise put "spirit into his sermons," which could not be rivalled by the ordinary parson of the period, who too often passed his leisure lounging by his fireside.

The contrast is pointed in Fielding's Trulliber, who, "embodying the clerical somnolence of the day, never gets beyond his pigsties," and the model Parson Adams, who was a great walker; and Mr. Stephen is convinced that the literary movement at the end of the eighteenth century was due in great part, if not mainly, to the renewed practice of walking! Among other striking contrasts he gives this instance of its wholesome influence:—

Scott, in spite of his lameness, delighted in walks of twenty and thirty miles a day, in climbing crags, trusting to the strength of his arms to remedy the stumblings of his foot. The early strolls enabled him to saturate his mind with local traditions, and the passion for walking under difficulties showed the manly nature which has endeared him to three generations. Byron's lameness was too severe to admit of walking, and therefore all the unwholesome humours which would have been walked off in a good cross-country march accumulated in his brain and caused the defects, the morbid affectation and perverse misanthropy which half ruined the achievement of the most masculine intellect of his time.

Even old Jeremy Bentham, Mr. Stephen reminds us, kept himself up to his work for eighty years by his regular "post-jentacular circumgyrations." The correspondent who last summer demurred to our praise of the cycle will find in Mr. Stephen a distinguished ally. The miserable cyclist can only go where roads go, and above all he cannot trespass! We are by no means convinced, though we will not yield even to Mr. Stephen in our love of an irresponsible tramp. But this is how our grave moralist puts it:—

To me, for many years, it was a necessity of life to interpolate gulps of fresh air between the periods of inhaling London fogs. When once beyond the "town" I looked out for notices that trespassers would be prosecuted. That gave a strong presumption that the trespass must have some attraction. The cyclist could only reflect that trespassing for him was not only forbidden but impossible. To me it was a reminder of the many delicious bits of walking which, even in the neighbourhood of London, await the man who has no superstitious reverence for legal rights. It is indeed surprising how many charming walks can be contrived by a judicious combination of a little trespassing with the rights of way happily preserved over so many commons and foot-paths.

There are other passages we should have been glad to quote about the Lake District and Switzerland and "Pilgrim's Progress," and what may be found on Leith Hill, though without its tower it is not quite 1,000 feet high. But we must be content.

Of the other articles in the Monthly, none can be placed beside Mr. Stephen's, unless, indeed, the chapters of Mr. Anthony Hope's "Tristram of Blent," now drawing to a close, and already, we believe, separately published. More serious matter is found in Mr. E. C. Strutt's account of "Famine and its Causes in Italy," in which he shows what might be done to relieve most pitiful distress by much-needed irrigation works, by encouraging the growth of wheat rather than vines, and by certain fiscal reforms. "A Jesuit Plea for Jesuits," by John Gerard, S.J., showing them to be the most blameless and maligned of men, will be read with interest. If it is so, why they have got their reputation, is a question Mr. Gerard frankly acknowledges he cannot answer. Mr. R. Nisbet Bain writes very enthusiastically of the famous and most astonishingly prolific Hungarian novelist, Jókai. The illustrated article this month is by Mrs. Ady, on "The Castello of Milan."

The Contemporary is a somewhat dreary number, largely occupied with "The Economic Decay of Great Britain," "The Liberal Party and its Differences," "Maltese Grievances" and "The Foreign Policy of Lord Rosebery." There is an interesting article, by Mr. J. M. Bacon, on "Sifting the Atmosphere," recording some very curious observations and experiments, and Mr. W. W. Peyton contributes the first part of a study of "Anthropology and the Evolution of Religion," in which he aims to reinforce Mr. Andrew Lang's contention that "anthropology has simplified her problem by neglecting or ignoring her facts." He argues, with good reason as we think, that the popular anthropology has misread "the spirits of nature" and "ghosts," finding too poor a meaning in them, as the first signs of religious consciousness in man.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Auberon Herbert writes on "Assuming the Foundations," and asserts that the two great conditions necessary for individual improvement are that a man should think with truth and clearness, and that he should act freely—give free play to his nature. He then goes on to speak of the fundamental assumptions of religion, from the Catholic, the Protestant, and the Theist's point of view; and the article remains to be concluded. Lady Knightley writes on "Women as Home Workers," protesting against the legislation urged by "a body of persons called the Women's Industrial Council," as by undue interference making for mischievous results. Mrs. Staples, of Natal, in an article on "The Emigration of Gentlewomen" tells English ladies what they must expect if they go out to South Africa. In her opinion the Englishwoman makes the worst colonist, with her outspoken contempt for what is "out here" and colonial.

We who have seen know that England is not Paradise, and that in time insular prejudices and stupidity will give way to better feelings.

And she adds that emigrants who come willing to be pleased and ready to receive kindness, and are prepared to love and labour for the land, will receive a joyful welcome; for now more than ever "out there" they need the influence of the English Motherland.

THE PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNALS.

Among several other able philosophical papers in the July number of Mind we have been gratified to find a striking article by our friend Dr. S. H. Mellone on "The Nature of Self-Knowledge." This article is partly occupied with a reply to a criticism by Mr. F. H. Bradley, in a previous number of Mind, on some views expressed by Dr. Mellone in his important work on "Philosophical Criticism and Construction"; and Dr. Mellone clearly shows that Mr. Bradley's strictures, in part at least, arise out of a misunderstanding of the views in question. It would occupy far too much space to discuss all the aspects of Dr. Mellone's doctrine of Self-Knowledge, but, in the interest of the philosophy of ethics and religion, we will refer to two important features in the article in the case of which, if we rightly apprehend Dr. Mellone's meaning, we feel ourselves unable to follow him. One of these questions is, the true nature of the Self; the other is the Freedom of the Will. With regard to the Self, Dr. Mellone says:—

Both in psychology and metaphysics we must reject the notion of a "pure" or "transcendental" self. And the notion of an "empirical" self must go along with it, for the one is only conceived in antithesis to the other. The real self is that which is known and realised or lived in and through the actual process of conscious life. It is essentially manifested in this its content; its individual existence consists in gradually organising itself in certain explicit, definite forms. Hence if we use such terms as Noumenon and Phenomena, Reality and Appearances, we must say that the former is known through the latter and can be known in no other way.

This passage suggests the following question:—If there be no such reality as a "pure" or "transcendental" self, how are we to explain the fact to which, we believe, consciousness bears witness, that our true self can by volitional attention act causally upon its own states and motives, and, by thus emphasising and intensifying some rather than others, largely influence the processes of association and, consequently, the development of its own character? We fail to see how the self, if it really were what Dr. Mellone says it is, could intelligibly exercise any such function as this. The activity of the self, as he conceives it, does not appear to mean the power which the self possesses of causally acting upon, and in this way changing, its own particular states and motives, but to mean simply a property manifested in the changes which, according to necessary psychological principles, take place within the consciousness. The logical consequences of thus denying the existence, and therefore the activity, of a "pure" or transcendental self appear to us to have a momentous bearing on the philosophy both of ethics and of religion.

Essentially akin to this denial of the reality of a "pure" self is Dr. Mellone's account of the relation between Noumenon and Phenomena. "The former," he tells us, "is known through the latter, and can be known in no other way." Now we venture to think that the true distinction between the Real and the Phenomenal rests upon the consciousness which we have of the reality and the causal activity of that "pure" and "transcendental" self of ours, the very existence of which Dr. Mellone, in agreement apparently with Dr. Stout, emphatically declines to recognise. It appears to us that had we no "pure" self, capable of acting causally upon its own states and upon the world around us, we should have no notion at all of the Real as contrasted with the Phenomenal. As Professor Pringle Pattison, in accordance with Dr. Martineau, asserts; "it is in activity or the will that we, as it were, lay hold upon reality and have immediate assurance of it." And the Will, in the view of these eminent thinkers, is only conceivable as the act of a "pure" or "transcendental" self.

We turn now to our second question, that of man's Moral Freedom. In the thoughtful and valuable treatise previously referred to, Dr. Mellone, in a note, makes the significant statement:—

I am far from supposing that the Libertarian theory of liberum arbitrium is a completely true and adequate account of what takes place in our volitional activity; if put forward as being so, I think it deserves to be called "absurd." But I am convinced that it is much nearer the truth than any other theory of freedom which has been presented.

These words can only mean that the account of the self's power to decide between motives of different ethical rank, which is given by such philosophers as Dr. Martineau, Professors James and Seth, and countless other persons, is intrinsically "absurd"; and, no doubt, it must so appear to those thinkers who, like Drs. Mellone and Stout, decline to recognise the reality and the causality of a "pure" self. But then, on the other hand, the Libertarian philosophers in question could hardly help returning the compliment by applying a like epithet to that conception of the Self presented in Dr. Mellone's paper.

In a similar strain Dr. Mellone says, in a note to the present article, that "on the fact of freedom all philosophers, except the materialists, are agreed." If by "freedom" Dr. Mellone means (as all Libertarians that we know of do mean) that in all moral decisions for which a man rightly condemns himself, he possessed at the time of deciding the power to take the other alternative, then it is evident that the Absolute Idealists, for example, take an entirely different view of "the fact of freedom" from that taken by all Libertarian thinkers. If, however, by "the fact of freedom" Dr. Mellone means no more than that man in his moral decisions can act spontaneously, that is, without any foreign compulsion, then, assuredly, he is quite warranted in asserting that all philosophers, save materialists, are at one upon this matter; but then, it must be distinctly understood, their agreement upon this point does not at all touch the all-important controversy which lies at the basis of ethical and religious philosophy. As regards this controversy, it is not a question of fundamental importance whether the "necessity" which the Libertarians reject is regarded as having an external or an internal ground. Libertarians contend that, in the case of the moral decisions for which our conscience is felt to rightfully condemn us, we cannot but believe that it was possible for us at the time to have chosen the other possible course; Dr. Mellone, however, assures us that to appeal to consciousness to decide this controversy is "idle," for in such a case "the whole complexity of the problem lies in the interpretation of consciousness." But, so far as we can see, the interpretation of consciousness by a thinker, who has previously made up his mind that no "pure" and "transcendental" Self exists, can only have one possible result—namely, that of placing the interpreter in the category of those philosophers whom Professor William James so aptly characterises as "soft determinists."

We should not be at all sorry to learn that we have stupidly misunderstood and misinterpreted Dr. Mellone's words, for we find so much to admire and to accept in his philosophical writings that it would be a real pleasure for us to discover that we are after all at one with him on these two basal questions also.

In the Philosophical Review for July are three or four papers which will well repay careful perusal, among which the excellent article by Professor James Seth on "The Utilitarian Estimate of Knowledge," and that by Professor Woodbridge on "The Earliest Greek Philosophy," call for especial notice. As is usual in this admirable journal, the Reviews of Books and the Summaries of Articles from other philosophical periodicals are particularly valuable.

The International Journal of Ethics contains much readable and interesting matter. There is a highly speculative article by Mr. R. A. Bray on "Unity of Spirit as the Basis of a National Church," where "unity of spirit" does not imply "unity of either action, purpose, or belief." Those who, like the present writer, had the privilege of being personally acquainted with that original thinker and noble-minded man, the late Professor Thomas Davidson, will read with warm interest a good account of his life and writings under the heading, "A Democratic Philosopher and his Work." There is also a vigorous passage of arms between Professor Ritchie and Mr. J. M. Robertson on that burning question of the day, "The Moral Problems of War."

CATHOLIC CHRISTIANITY.

In the July number of the Great Meeting and Free Christian Church Messenger, the Rev. H. Gow published some "Thoughts suggested by Whit-week Religious Meetings," in which he spoke especially of the stimulating effect of the International Council Meetings, and quoted a saying of Mr. Stopford Brooke's that we as Unitarians lack confidence, and do not realise the power of our gospel. That criticism Mr. Gow accepts as true, and we take the liberty of reproducing the rest of his article here:—

We are not hopeful and joyous enough: we are not fervent enough: we are too apologetic. We do not value sufficiently the gospel we possess. The only justification for a little party or a little church is to feel they stand for a great principle, not for criticism or negative views. Our special work is not to deny the Trinity but to affirm the love of God, not to deny the Incarnation, but to affirm the divinity of man. It need not trouble us by what name we are called: noble thoughts and deeds will give higher meanings to any name. But the two greatest names in religion which best describe our faith and aims are Christian and Catholic. Catholic Christianity seems to me to describe better than any other phrase our faith and our ideals.

I wish it were possible for us to take those names. Whether possible or not to use those names it is possible to live in the spirit of them. Christian is a word which has been used with many different meanings, but I believe I give its fundamental true meaning when I say that a Christian is a man who believes in the supremacy of love. True life means love: all problems are solved by love: all temptations are conquered by love. The way of life is the way of love. God is love and man shares in the divine life and becomes consciously a child of God through love. The Christ-life is essentially the life of love, and the Christian is one who recognises that such a life is the highest and strongest kind of human life. To say this sounds like making religion a matter of sentiment. When we think of love as merely sentiment we ought to remember the great command of Judaism repeated and enlarged by Jesus. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy mind and with all thy soul and with all thy strength," and "thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." There is love enthroned as the supreme duty, but love not as a mere emotion but as possessing the whole man.

There was a curious diversity of opinions expressed by leading speakers at the meetings to which I have referred about the place of the historic Jesus in rational and free religion. I mention it as throwing light on the meaning of the word Christian. The Rev. Stopford Brooke expressed in the most emphatic way his sense of the need of the personality of Jesus in religion. Jesus was and must remain for ever our master: he when lifted up on high and made clear to all would draw all men to him. The Christianity of the future would be a Christianity which would be passionately loyal to our master Jesus. It would believe in God and the soul and it would follow Christ.

Professor Carpenter, on the other hand, looked for a Christianity in which the person of Jesus would count continually for less not more. His spirit, his ideals, his faith, would be reverenced more and more deeply and would prevail more widely, but the man in whom that spirit dwelt, the man who so largely realised those ideals, he, the historic Jesus, would occupy less space and might even come to be forgotten.

And a third speaker Mr. Graham Wallas, whose paper was in some respects the most deeply thoughtful and impressive of any given at the Conference, stated it as his opinion that the religion of the future which was destined to solve the gravest problems, and to bring peace and joy upon the earth would have more similarity to Buddhism than to Christianity. We shall most of us feel in disagreement with this last statement, and perhaps even be shocked by it. But it was uttered in an address marked by intense religious feeling as well as splendid intellectual power. For my own part I distinctly disbelieve that Buddhism is a higher type of religion than Christianity, or is capable of becoming so. On the other hand I think we all have to be careful not to hold to Jesus and to talk about him with conventional admiration because it is respectable and because it saves us the trouble of thinking. When I hear a man like Mr. Wallas speaking in all seriousness, with no desire to shock, with no pleasure in being peculiar, I feel I am listening to a man who is at any rate above convention, daring to think and to see things for himself, and expressing what he feels without fear of consequences. There are few things more refreshing than that.

Buddhism, as Mr. Wallas conceives it, is, of course, something much larger than the popular idea of it. The popular idea of the Buddhist is, I suppose, that he is a man who wants to empty himself of all emotion, to destroy his desires and pass into the rest of unconsciousness which he calls Nirvana. That is, I think, the truth but not the whole truth. The life and aims of Buddha, as portrayed in "The Light of Asia," or any of his biographies was much more than this. He is intensely loving and sympathetic, and pitiful. He gives up the dignity and calm of eastern kingship, and becomes a wandering outcast just to help others. Assuredly he knows what is meant by losing life in order to save it. The essential difference between the Christian and the Buddhist seems to me to be that the Buddhist is a loving man in a loveless world, and the Christian is a loving man in a loving world. In the one case love is fighting against the nature of things, in the other it is fighting with it. This element in Buddhism is exactly expressed in Matthew Arnold's well-known lines:—

Ah love, let us be true
To one another: for the world which seems
To lie before us like a land of dreams
So various, so beautiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy nor love nor light,
Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain;
And we are here as on a darkling plain,
Swept with confused alarm of struggle and flight,
Where ignorant armies clash by night.

That is a picture of love in a loveless universe. Human love and self-sacrifice, it feels, are the highest things in the world, but they are not the strongest. Matter is stronger, death is stronger. Men who cling to love and who at the same time think the world stronger than love are very admirable and heroic, but they lack joy and the power which joy gives. They have no thought of reward, but they do good sadly: they are living beautiful noble lives, but feeling all the time that love must lose. A great underlying melancholy marks them, a sense of the vanity of life, a longing for rest; they are free from selfishness, but free also from happiness, and the strong efforts which spring from hope. Now to the Christian, the meaning of the law of human life is love, and the meaning of the universe is love too, a love mysterious, austere, even terrible at times, but love none the less. He is not fighting with a blank unconsciousness, with which it is his wisdom to be reconciled: the nature of things is good and loving: it means joy and life, and ever more joy and more life. To believe that, to act on that, and in times of trial and temptation and darkness, still to cling to that, this seems to me Christianity.

And by a Catholic Christian I mean one who, as a Christian, feels this supremacy of love, and who will not suffer himself to be divided from others by lesser things. He sees good men and women busying themselves about a hundred things for which he does not care. He sees them laying stress on names and doctrines, he hears them speaking of sacraments, and priesthoods, and Bibles as though without them there were no salvation. He finds them offended with himself, banishing him from their communion because he does not agree with them about the importance of these things. He is in a world where party and sect are full of zeal and full of prejudice. The Catholic Christain will not retaliate—and much more important than any outward retaliation, he will not suffer his love and sympathy to be estranged from other churches because they are estranged from him. He will ask only one thing, that men should believe in love as the supreme power in human life, and he will assuredly find that faith in the best men of all the Christian sects, and in many who are outside the Christian Church altogether. Whatever the variety of opinions about the nature of Jesus and the meaning of his message, however distorted the views and subtle the doctrines, no church or creed has been able entirely to eliminate the spirit of Jesus, the spirit of love for man and devotion to the highest.

Through all the ages with their many forms of faith, which have passed since his day, the great figure of Jesus looks down, calling men by many voices and in many ways to follow him. No sincere and earnest man can so misunderstand him as not to know that following Jesus, whatever else it means, means love, means gentleness, means self-less devotion to the good and true. The Gospel of Jesus is that there is an Eternal Love without, sustaining and inspiring this love within the human heart. Love is not lonely fighting against nature: it finds its source and strength and end in God. We want to make this faith more simple, to free it from misunderstanding, above all to live it in our own lives. Surely the possession of such a faith, so catholic, so beautiful, so good, should give us confidence and make us speak and think and act with energy and gladness.

SYMPATHY WITH MOSLEMS.

SIR, — The question asked by Dr. Tyssen at the end of his letter, where to find details of the martyrdom of Hussain in the English language, suggests another question;—which is likely to be most serviceable to intending candidates in the singular competition proposed by his Moslem friend—fact or fiction? If fact is what is wanted, the soberest and most trustworthy English historian of early Islam is, so far as my reading goes, Sir Wm. Muir. It is true that his "Life of Mahomet" and "Early Caliphate" are written avowedly in the interest of orthodox Evangelical Christianity; but an avowed bias is often the least dangerous, and, in his case, it seems only to make him the more scrupulously careful to explain the canons of criticism by which he has been guided in his use of the original sources. Whether he would have retained his orthodoxy had he made it his business to apply the same critical methods to the New Testament is a question that does not now concern us. It is enough that in his chosen field he shows himself eminently scholarly, candid, and even sympathetic. And this is his comment on the demonstrations of horror and indignation which the tragedy of Kerbela evokes at every recurrence of the Mohurrum:—

> The fond believer forgets that Hosein, leader of the band, having broken his allegiance, and yielded himself to a treasonable, though impotent, design upon the throne, was committing an offence that endangered society, and demanded swift suppression. He can see nought but the cruel and ruthless hand that slew with few exceptions all in whose veins flowed their Prophet's sacred blood.*

He adds in a footnote that "the whole of the sad tale becomes at this point so intensified, and so overlaid with Alyite fiction, that it is impossible to believe a hundredth part of what the heated imagination of the Shiyites has invented."

Omitting Washington Irving, who does not (I think) claim any acquaintance with the original sources, the only other English accounts known to me are those of the late Colonel Osborn's "Islam under the Arabs" (Longmans, 1876); substantially in accord with Muir, but slightly less favourable to the Ommayad side; and Ameer Ali's "Short History of the Saracens" (Macmillan, 1899). To those who prefer picturesque fiction, among whom the anonymous founder of the prize is probably to be included, I should certainly recommend the last.

The story in its simplest form is tragic and pathetic enough; but without very liberal aid from fiction it is hard to see where the martyrdom comes in, unless we are to describe as martyrdom the doom which probably awaited "bonnie Prince Charlie" had he been caught after Culloden.

The grandson of Mahomet staked his life on a bold throw for the most splendid prize, the widest and most absolute dominion, that the then known world had to offer. He lost the game and forfeited the stake, and he so managed matters as to involve nearly his whole family and his most devoted followers in his ruin. There was nothing specially blameable, but neither was there anything specially admirable or Christlike, either in the attempt itself or in his way of carrying it out. His claim was neither better nor worse than that of his rival, who had the advantage of possession; or rather it was better on one theory of government, worse on another; it was for the Moslems generally to decide between them, and they did decide by the rough but only practicable test of battle. He sought a kingdom of this world, and was led to expect that he should find servants to fight for him, but was deceived as to their number and quality, as they on their side were disappointed in him as leader.

The nearest English analogue to the Mohurrum lamentations for Hassan and Hussain is the commemoration of "King Charles the Martyr," only lately excised from our national liturgy; and the political causes which led to the institution of the two solemnities bear as close a resemblance as is compatible with the social difference between the England of Milton and the Asia of the Abbassides.

The tragedy of Kerbela, like that longer tragedy called Muhammadan history of which it is so typical an episode, might doubtless be made the subject of many moving and instructive sermons; but the true lesson of it all, as I read it, is hardly one that will commend itself to any professed Muhammadan, however liberal. For it is the old lesson concerning grapes and thorns; the root of the thorn-tree being in this case the initial lie of Mahomet that his Koran, with all its false history, its horrible eschatology, its furious maledictions, and its personal opportunism, was dictated to him literally from Heaven, word by word, and sentence by sentence, as he required it. No amount of Carlylean rhapsody will ever avail to clear Mahomet from responsibility for this lie; nor indeed does Carlyle himself go the length of complete acquittal. The root of falsehood being there from the beginning, the fruit was corresponding. The more devout the believer, the more deeply was he pledged to enforce in all points a law which his unpledged reason would certainly have condemned at some point; the more inevitable was it that society should turn in despair, from the instinct of self-preservation, from the man of wrongly-based principle to the man of unprincipled expediency; from an Ali to a Muawiya, from a Hussain to a Yezid; only to feel again after an interval the stings of remorse and the need of principle, and to try another revival of fierce fanaticism.

That see-saw is Muhammadan history.

SIR,—I have unfortunately sent my INQUIRER on; but if I recollect right a correspondent asks for information about the Martyrdom of Hussain.

I believe there is no fuller account of this great action than Colonel Lewis Pelly's "Miracle play of Hassan and Hussain," collected from oral tradition, revised by A. N. Wollaston. 2 vols. London: Allen and Co., 1879.

I do not know whether this book is readily accessible or not; but if any correspondent would care to work out this

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Atherton (Chowbent Chapel).—The collections during the opening of the new organ amounted to £125 12s. On Sunday last Mr. John Harrison, of London, a native of Chowbent, and the son of a former minister (the Rev. Dr. Harrison, 1838-1847), was the organist, and met with a warm welcome from the congregation.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, July 31, at the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. M. A. Ruck, about thirty members and friends of the sewing circle connected with Earl-street Chapel paid a visit to their residence at Hollingbourne, and were entertained at tea on the lawn. Afterwards, through the generosity of their hosts, they visited Leeds Park Flower Show, and were shown over the Castle and grounds.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. W. G. Tarrant acknowledges the following additional donations to the Excursion fund:—C. A. L., £1; Miss P., 10s. The total received—£6 13s.—has just cleared the expense, and cordial thanks are returned to the kind donors.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—On the 24th ult. the seventeenth annual flower show was held in connection with the Window Gardening Society. Of the 235 plants sold last April 125 were brought in for exhibition, being about twenty more than last year. The chair was taken at 8.30 P.M. by the Rev. F. Summers, whose remarks on the requirements of plants should be of value to competitors. The prizes were distributed by Miss E. J. Garrett, who has taken great interest in the society for many years past. During the evening music was rendered by Miss Hutchinson, Mr. Clark, and Mr. Arthur Thompson.

Newtownards (co. Down).—On Sunday, Aug. 4, Miss Mabelle Biggart, B.A., of New York City, preached morning and evening to good congregations, including many belonging to other churches. In the morning her subject was "Simon the Cross-Bearer," and evening "The Master Soul." Both addresses were luminous and inspiring, and delivered with great eloquence. Both friends and strangers were greatly pleased, and expressed their thanks to her after service for her inspiring and helpful message.

Swansea.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. W. Tudor Jones preached a sermon in memory of Mr. Wm. Terrill, F.C.S., M.I.M.M., who died at the age of fifty-five. Since the advent of the present minister to Swansea, Mr. Terrill had been a constant attendant at the Unitarian Church. He was one of the founders of the local Geological Society, the Art Society, and the energetic secretary of the Swansea Scientific Society. A large number of prominent men belonging to the various denominations of the town attended the memorial service.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT is proposed to place a Memorial Brass in Mansford-street Church, Bethnal Green, recording the long connection of the late Rev. C. L. Corkran with Spicer-street Mission, which was the predecessor of Mansford-street, and the first station to established by the London Domestic Mission Society. The promoters of this most fitting memorial state that the cost will be upwards of £20, and that any surplus will be applied to that mission work, which during his long and devoted life Mr. Corkran had so much at heart. Donations may be sent to Miss L. Jones, Riverton, Hadley Wood, Barnet, or to Mr. J. G. Foster, 48, Meanley-road, Manor Park, E.

PROFESSOR MONTET, a translation of whose paper at the International Council in Whit-week will be found in our present issue, is Dean of the Theological Faculty in the University of Geneva, and editor of Le Progrès Religieux, a fortnightly organ of Liberal Christianity in that city. In the issue of June 15, Dr. Montet gave his impressions of the London meetings, and, while adding warm expressions of gratitude for the hospitality extended to foreign delegates, noted in conclusion the two following points as gladdening results clearly established by the meetings :—

(i.) English and American Unitarianism, which has made considerable progress during the latter years of the nineteenth century, represents an important element in the Protestant Churches of English-speaking peoples. That Unitarianism is animated by a religious life intense and deep, and we felt our faith strengthened in contact with the faith by which it lives.

(ii.) English and American Unitarianism has reached the same doctrinal conclusions as the Liberal Protestantism of the Continent. And further, as we declared on several occasions during the sittings of the Congress, we felt ourselves in complete union of spirit and of religious thought with the Unitarians of England and America.

M. HENRI RÉVILLE, a younger brother of Professor Albert Réville, of Paris, had been for fifty years the Protestant pastor at Luneray, and his devoted people were preparing to celebrate his jubilee in October; but on July 26 a higher summons came to him, and they have to mourn his loss instead. It is a long family succession in the ministry at Luneray, which is thus closed, for Henri Réville followed his brother, his father, and his grandfather in the service of the one church. He settled at Luneray in 1851, at a time of keen controversy in the church, but such strife was utterly repugnant to his affectionate and peaceable disposition, and he was always a conciliator of differences. A Liberal of the old school, his whole heart was given to the pastoral care of his people and to the cause of education. The gathering at his funeral of people of all classes showed how deeply his influence had been felt. Among those who took part in the service were his nephew, Professor Jean Réville, and M. Hardy, President of the Dieppe Consistory, who spoke of the ministry of their friend as having been animated by the Gospel precept, "Love one another."

WRITING of the late Professor Fiske, in the Boston Transcript, Professor Royce of Harvard drew a distinction between men whose childhood "contains the prophecy, the visible beginning of what their coming life is to be," and those "in whose development the child is killed, so to speak, in order that the man may be made." People of the first class, to which Wordsworth and Goethe belonged, "know that, however they have matured, the child is father of the man"; and so it was with John Fiske :—

His childhood is described as having been a healthy one. He developed a very effective and mature mental power upon the basis of interests that date far back into this wholesome early life. He grew to a very high mental level, but he never outgrew that essential sweetness of nature and that childlike fidelity to certain extremely simple and profound ideals which always marked him. This sweetness of nature, this fidelity to such ideals, must have been grounded in the still but half-conscious interests of his busy and precocious boyhood. Now this childlike element in Fiske was in no wise his defect. It was his strength. It was his wisdom. It gave him the collecting child's fondness for vast masses of details, side by side with the philosopher's love for interpreting the universe—the healthy child's deep assurance that life is a lovely thing, an intimate union with the modern investigator's inevitable disposition to observe how much the visible world shows us that is disheartening and evil—the child's love of the unseen and the mysterious, along with the modern sceptical student's scorn for superstition. This childlike quality lighted up all his stores of information with its gentle enthusiasm. It won him the sympathy of numerous hearers to whom his opinions would have been repellent, or to whom his studies would have seemed hopelessly complicated, if his temperament had not assured them, through every tone of his voice, through every quality of his literary style, that his heart was cheerful and that his faith was simple. His power over the public lay in his thus reassuring the heart while he both liberalised and disciplined the intellect—in his thus spreading the contagion of a gentle faith, even while he seemed to himself and to others to be condemning without mercy the traditions of the fathers. Unless one understands this aspect of Fiske's nature and influence, the unity of his work remains unintelligible.

WE quoted last week from Mr. Leslie Stephen's article in the Monthly Review "In Praise of Walking." What we then said has, we hope, sent many readers to the article itself, but we cannot refrain from adding here one more passage, which describes some of Mr. Stephen's most delightful walks :—

I have followed the coast at different times from the mouth of the Bristol Avon by the Land's End to the Isle of Wight, and I am only puzzled to decide which bay or cape is the most delightful. I only know that the most delightful was the more enjoyable when placed in its proper setting by a long walk. When you have made an early start, followed the coast-guard track on the slopes above the cliffs, struggled through the gold and purple carpeting of gorse and heather on the moors, dipped down into quaint little coves with a primitive fishing village, followed the blinding whiteness of the sands round a lovely bay, and at last emerged upon a headland where you can settle into a nook of the rocks, look down upon the glorious blue of the Atlantic waves breaking into foam on the granite, and see the distant sea-levels glimmering away till they blend imperceptibly into cloudland; then you can consume your modest sandwiches, light your pipe, and feel more virtuous and thoroughly at peace with the universe, than it is easy even to conceive yourself elsewhere.

POSTAL MISSION.—Will Mr. W. Pickersgill, formerly of Whalley New-road, Blackburn, whose letter has been mislaid, be good enough to communicate with Mrs. Crompton, Rivington Hall, Horwich, Bolton-le-Moors ?

EFFECTS OF WAR.

IN the August number of the Mill Hill Pulpit, the Rev. Charles Hargrove utters a much needed word of warning and of encouragement. The title of the sermon is "Turning Back: A Danger of War Time," the lesson being drawn from the Story of Israel, with its longing to be back in Egypt, a story in which, as an allegory, "Every aspiring nationality may note its own dangers and disappointments, every struggling soul of man may read its own temptations and failures and sorrows." Now especially, in the time of war, it is for us to resist the harking back to the primitive savage instincts of our race, and to hold fast to our faith in the progress of humanity. Even when war has been inevitable and is counted just, it is yet in the strictest sense an appeal to brute force.

It awakens, it even sanctions, passions which in time of peace the law severely represses, and makes a merit of acts which would otherwise be universally regarded as criminal. "War is war," we are constantly reminded, and we are compelled to admit that however humane be the disposition of the commanders, it is impossible to make war unless authority be given to kill and wound and destroy, and what is generally unlawful be commanded and approved. In war time the spirit of our barbarian forefathers, who carried sword and fire through Ancient Britain and so made it England, revives in us; and those who cannot fight incite the combatants from afar, revile the foe, and applaud the champions of their own side, in language which is simply a confession that our civilisation is as yet but skin-deep. "They fought like lions, like tigers," I have heard it said, as if this were praise which should be welcome in the ears of men who live in an age of refinement and Christianity.

How lamentably the deteriorating influence of the war passion has worked in the people of this country, and how disastrous the results it threatens, Mr. Hargrove points out in this further passage:—

One shudders to read the sentiments which widely circulated newspapers make themselves responsible for. Magnanimity is held up to open scorn, and lust of empire is exalted as if it were the only real greatness of mind. Such precepts as "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you" are regarded, not as ideals of conduct too high for our present lowly attainments, but as unworthy of a brave and strong people. And even a hearing is refused for those who, with the sanction of Government, plead for helpless foes who are the destitute and suffering victims of war.

Now all this is quite natural; "war is war" not only on the field of battle but at home. Nevertheless it is to be strenuously resisted, lest we fall back in our ways as in our hearts to the Egypt we have left. "In war," says the accepted maxim, "laws have no voice." It is an appeal to force in its various forms: force of limb, force of endurance, force of resources, force of skill, must eventually triumph. It is idle to appeal against this ultimate tribunal, but it is all-important to be on our guard to rigidly limit its jurisdiction, nor let the Right of Might in any form assert itself where laws yet have sway.

We tremble for the future, we who inheriting of noble fathers the watchwords Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform, now see everywhere dominant the Spirit of War, attended with reckless expenditure and indifference to the improvement of the people's lot. It is not the interests of a party but of civilisation, of Christianity, which are at stake. It is not that this or that set of personages should hold office which matters; it is that the new man, the man who is the latest product of all the experiences and warnings of the past should hold the upper hand and keep in subjection "the old man with his deeds," the lower instincts, the ignorant narrow policies, the meaner ideals of the past.

A NEW CENTURY SERVICE AT GENEVA.

THE ministers of the National Protestant Church of Geneva have issued a most interesting memorial of a solemn new century service of devotion, held on the morning of Jan. 4 in that city, to which all Protestant pastors resident in Geneva, of whatever denomination, were invited. Twenty-four of these, of whom Professor Montet was one, through absence from home, or illness, or some other cause, were prevented from being present; but more than seventy, together with a number of theological students, met in the Hall of the Consistory and united in the service, under the presidency of the Rev. D. Delétra, of Dardagny. The addresses, which were given by orthodox and liberal alike, were remarkable for the unity of spirit which prevailed. The President noted a hopeful change in the attitude of evangelical preaching, which dwelt not so exclusively as formerly on "faith," but rather in life, realising that works are essential for the preservation of faith. And, further, the old sectarian and doctrinal conflicts, the theological warfare of argument and texts, are giving way to a broader conception of the evolution of religious thought. The standard for to-day is the production of life and life-giving power. Every system of dogma, every ecclesiastical organisation, which does not produce life is condemned to decline and death. Dogma has been the source of division among Christians, but there are not two ideals of the Christian life, and that life is a source of union. The definition of the Churches of the future (would that we could dare to say the Church of the future!) will be an association of all who aspire after the Christian life, and its confession will be composed of the three words, "Life in Christ." Thus will be reached the true synthesis of faith and works. And the President reminded his hearers that Paul had long ago expressed that ideal in the words, "giving diligence to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." Among the other speakers were Pastor Perrelet, of the Free Church of Geneva, who said that in the life of devotion and Christian communion they must find their true union, in which they would forget all outward differences and realise their brotherhood, and the Rev. Frank Thomas, of the Evangelical Christian Association, who said that the ethical movement apart from religion was a reproach to the Church, which had not always proclaimed by word and by example that religion is morality, and morality religion. "There must be one moral standard for layman and minister, for week-day and Sunday, for man and woman." The Rev. John Gaillard, representing the liberal element in the Genevan Church, spoke of the true progress of evangelical preaching, mindful of the intellectual and social conditions of the present. Amid the spread of popular scientific knowledge, and the social aspirations of the people, they had to maintain the truth of a pure spiritual gospel, and the ideal of the Kingdom of God on earth.

THE August number of the Cornhill Magazine is its five-hundredth, a fact celebrated on the first page in the following rondeau by Mr. Austin Dobson:—

For two score years the tumbling spray
Has fallen from our bows away;—
What change of skipper and of crew,
Since first the Cornhill sailed the blue,
Grain-laden, Master, Thackeray!

Trollope, George Eliot, Gaskell,—nay,
Our own dear "Blackstick" of to-day,—
What wealth of genius old and new
For two score years!

Once more we steer across the bay.
With no vain thoughts our hearts are gay:—
Our log is clean, our course is true;
What we have done we mean to do;—
We hope, once more, to lead the way
For two score years!

THE August number of the New Kingdom opens with a portrait of Kristofer Janson, the apostle of Liberal religious thought in Norway, with a translation of Mr. Theo. Berg's account of him, taken from Det Glade Budskab of Sept. 15, 1899, the predecessor of Lys over Landet, the present weekly paper of the Unitarian movement in Copenhagen. We hope to publish next week Mr. Janson's contribution to the International Council meeting, and may then add a further note concerning him. The New Kingdom also gives us a picturesque article on the Hucklow Holiday Home, from the Manchester City News, and usefully reprints the latter part of the Head Master's Address on Speech Day at Willaston, which appeared in THE INQUIRER of July 13. The Rev. W. C. Hall contributes the fourth of a series of articles on "The New Unitarianism," and the Rev. Andrew Chalmers tells of "Sundays in Strange Temples," as he did some years ago in the pages of the Christian Reformer.

THREE CENTURIES AFTER CALVIN.

LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM IN SWITZERLAND AT THE BEGINNING OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

BY PROFESSOR EDOUARD MONTET, D.D., OF GENEVA.*

IN German Switzerland, Zwingli, by his broad views on the subject of religion, had been to a certain extent the precursor of liberal Protestantism. In French Switzerland, on the contrary, Calvin, whose vigorous faith and religious genius had constituted Geneva the centre for the propaganda of the Reformation in French-speaking countries, had stamped this Reformation with a decisive character of dogmatic narrowness and ecclesiastical intolerance. Castelléon, who was compelled during Calvin's lifetime to quit Geneva, was the most illustrious champion, at this period, of the enfranchisement of religious thought from the yoke of Tradition.

Since those memorable times, the liberal religious movement has gone on and asserted itself, in the course of the history of the Swiss Protestant Churches, with ever-varying fate according to circumstances, occasions, and localities; but whatever has been its fate, at no time has the current which has borne Religion towards that complete spiritual liberty enjoyed by us to-day ceased to make itself felt. It is quite manifest, however, that the liberal spirit, in the domain of faith and of the Church, has really only blossomed out in the course of the nineteenth century.

Let us rapidly examine at the dawn of the twentieth century, that is to say, more than three centuries after Calvin, the position of liberal Protestantism in Switzerland, and let us briefly draw up, as it were, a balance-sheet of the religious progress achieved in this country during the century.

Liberalism in German Switzerland.

To Zürich must be ascribed the honour, in German Switzerland, of having held aloft the standard of religious liberalism. The part played by Zürich from this point of view dates from Dr. Strauss's settlement in that city in 1839. If Dr. Strauss, whilst opening the way to liberal Protestantism, accomplished, on the whole, nothing but a negative and destructive work, Biedermann, starting likewise from the principles of the Hegelian Philosophy, became the creator of a new dogmatic. The journal which, at this period, stoutly combated, in the ecclesiastical field, the system of confessions of faith, had for its title Die Kirche der Gegenwart ("The Church of the Present").

Between orthodoxy and liberalism there arose an intermediate party, whose views were expounded in the Kirchenblatt ("The Church Gazette"): this conciliatory party, with its broad tendencies, had for its chief representative the theologian Hagenbach.

After a lull lasting for a few years, the struggle between the two elements, liberal and conservative, in the Protestant Churches of German Switzerland, was begun again by the liberal dogmatist, Lang. The Faculty of Theology at Berne was at this time the stronghold of the new school. The influence exerted by the Left became henceforth preponderating; it achieved the liberalisation of the ecclesiastical laws in the various cantons (1870–1874). The party of conciliation was not slow to enter upon the same path, and likewise rejected all compulsory confession of faith.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century we find, in German Switzerland, side by side with the Right, who maintain uncompromisingly the principle of confessions of faith as affording the indispensable basis for every church, the Left (the Reformers) represented successively by the Zeitstimmen ("Voices of the Times"), and the Schweizerisches Protestantenblatt (the "Swiss Protestant Journal"), and the Centre (Die Vermittler, the Conciliators), with its organ, the Kirchenblatt ("The Church Gazette").

Party Divisions now less Acute.

At the opening of the twentieth century, we learn that these three tendencies continue to exist, but that the differences which distinguish them are much less clearly marked than they were twenty-five years ago. Party spirit has yielded to the liberal religious spirit, which tends to penetrate more and more completely the groups which at one time remained more or less strangers to its influence.

At the present moment, liberal Protestantism is brilliantly represented, as regards theological teaching, at the Universities of Zürich and Berne. Pre-eminent in connection with philanthropic and moral institutions is the name of Pastor Bion, of Zürich, the founder of the society of the "Sisters of the Red Cross," an association devoid of any sectarian character, whose members labour in the hospitals at Zürich, Winterthur, and St. Gall. Pastor Bion has collected for this association, which was established in 1882, and also for the institutions dependent upon it, the considerable sum of 800,000 francs (£32,000). Liberal Protestantism in German Switzerland has also rendered signal service in battling with the evils of intemperance, &c.

The Swiss Union of Liberal Christianity and the Society of Protestant Missions.

It remains for us to draw attention to two points in especial in the liberal religious movement of this part of Switzerland, which is by far the most considerable in its area and in the number of the Protestants.

In the first place, and above all, must be mentioned the foundation in 1870 of "The Swiss Union of Liberal Christianity," an extensive association with ramifications in most of the Protestant cantons—in Bâle, Berne, Aargau, Soleure, Appenzell, St. Gall, Zürich, and Geneva—and which is assuredly one of the great forces of Protestant liberalism in Switzerland.

Then, in the second place, must be mentioned the creation in 1884 of "The General Society of Protestant Missions," whose present headquarters are at Berlin, but in whose foundation Swiss liberal Protestantism played a prominent part. This society has striven to establish missionary enterprise on liberal lines, inculcating respect for the religions of non-Christian peoples, and spiritualising the elements of truth which they contain. So far this society supports missionaries only in China and Japan.

Liberalism in French Switzerland.
(i.) Neuchâtel.

In the three different cantons of French Switzerland the course of the liberal religious movement has varied greatly. Neuchâtel holds the place of honour in the battles waged in this part of Switzerland in support of the claims of spiritual liberty. In 1869 a group of enlightened laymen, under the leadership of Professor F. Buisson, entered upon an ever memorable contest with Orthodoxy at Neuchâtel, hitherto the undisputed mistress of the National Church in this canton. Professor F. Buisson represented the most advanced type of religious liberalism. The result of this campaign was the adoption of a new ecclesiastical law securing for ministers of religion in matters of faith explicit liberty of conscience. A reaction set in against this liberal movement with a pertinacity only equalled by the rapidity of its propagation, and an independent church took shape which maintained with a firm hand the banner of orthodoxy. If, since that occasion, broader views in regard to religion have made any progress in the canton of Neuchâtel, it must be admitted that they have not been openly professed except in the case of a few individuals, and these have not succeeded in establishing any important or compact group of adherents.

(ii.) Vaud. Alexandre Vinet (1797–1847).

The Canton Vaud, which had the honour of being the birthplace of Vinet, seemed destined, with the aid of a theologian so eminent, to enter deliberately on the path of religious liberalism. Had not Vinet, in fact, said that "a Protestant, taking that word in its widest acceptation, is a man who investigates before he submits"? Could anything more aptly define religious liberalism than these noteworthy words? Yet it was with the Canton Vaud as it was with Vinet himself. Owing to temperament, owing to a moderation which led to the importation of the Reformation of the sixteenth century from Berne, instead of its spontaneous production from the soil, this canton, whatever influence may have been exerted there later on by the spirit of religious liberty, always, as a matter of fact, remained separated from the liberal churches of the rest of Switzerland.

When, in 1837, Vinet was elected Professor in the Faculty of Theology at Lausanne, he combated boldly certain weak points in the preaching of Evangelicalism. When, however, in 1839, the great Council of Vaud abolished the obligation hitherto required of signing the Helvetic Confession, Vinet pronounced against this intermeddling of the civil authority in the domain of faith. But when, in 1847, after the famous resignation of a number of clergy, brought about by a new political measure of the Government, the question arose of the organisation of the new church, which was to be untrammelled by State control, Vinet proposed a Confession of Faith of such breadth, for its underlying principle, as to shock more than one member of the new community. Vinet was an individualist, in the fullest sense of the word, and this subjectivism might have carried him a good deal further; but his surroundings, and the moderation of his own temperament did not allow him to break away from orthodoxy. Vinet remained in an orthodox church, although, in fact, he no longer belonged to the doctrines of orthodoxy either by mental affinity or by conviction.

Speaking generally, Protestantism in Canton Vaud has pursued the same line of conduct as Vinet himself. When, in 1869, F. Buisson, A. Réville, and others came to speak in Lausanne, people were eager to go and hear these distinguished orators, these innovators of world-wide reputation; but their persuasive eloquence produced apparently no decided movement in the direction of liberal religion.

Since that time, however, great progress has been made, and it is certain that broadened views on religion have sunk deep into the different sections of the Church of Vaud. We need no other proof of this than the scientific method pursued and honoured in the teaching of theology at Lausanne, whether it be in the National Faculty or the Free Faculty of Theology. But, if it were desired to characterise by a single word the religious tendency of the Canton Vaud, at the present time, in respect to its doctrinal position, we do not think we should be doing any injustice to this canton in attributing to it a certain crypto-liberalism rather than any bonâ-fide liberal Christianity.

Entirely different has been the trend of religious ideas in the Canton of Geneva.* We must recollect that in this canton we are dealing with a people imbued in the highest degree with the spirit of originality and enterprise. A Bishop of Geneva once said, speaking of this people: "Gens semper appetens aliquid novi." At the commencement of the nineteenth century, the old type of Liberalism still held sway in the Church of Geneva—a type which professed in things doctrinal, supernaturalism; while rejecting in its ecclesiastical constitution any system of confessions of faith. This old-world, highly-respectable Liberalism has been not unjustly reproached with a certain lack of religious depth, and it was combated by the spirit of the Evangelical movement of England and Scotland, on its importation into Europe at the time of the Restoration.

Politics were in those days closely connected with the religious life of the people of Geneva. The aristocracy, which had entirely separated itself from the Evangelical movement at its origin, sought later, through its alarm at the chimerical dangers of religious liberalism, when exerted in the political sphere, to come into closer union, doctrinally, with the Free Churches, of the Evangelical movement; and, as a consequence of this, since the middle of the nineteenth century, Orthodoxy has tended to assert itself as the dominant factor in the Church of Geneva. And so, when the new school of liberal thought attempted, in the person of Albert Réville, in 1864, to spread abroad its views in Geneva, it met with a very poor reception.

Progress of Liberalism.

Certain acts of intolerance committed at that time by the Orthodox majority, such as the refusal of the Cathedral pulpit to such men as A. Réville, Fontanès, and Pelissier, at length aroused the people of Geneva. When, therefore, in 1869, Professor Buisson delivered at Geneva the course of lectures which he had previously delivered at Neuchâtel, the liberal movement forthwith took a wholly fresh start. Professor Congnard drew crowds to church by his eloquence; whilst others (e.g., Pastor Chantre) organised the new party for the promotion of liberal religion. The journal entitled The Liberal Alliance was at this date the organ of religious liberalism. From 1870 onwards, Liberalism in Geneva has continued to make considerable strides. In 1871 the Consistory, elected by universal suffrage, was equally divided between the Liberals and the Orthodox party. Shorty afterwards, a bye-election gave the Liberals a majority on this body. Finally, in 1875, the Orthodox party declined to vote, and as a consequence the Consistory had a mere minority of the Orthodox party, and these were elected by the Liberals themselves.

A New Liberal Constitution.

At about the same time, in 1874, the Great Council and the people of Geneva adopted a new ecclesiastical constitution of the most liberal character. "Any minister," it is therein enjoined, "may preach and teach freely on his own responsibility; nor may this liberty be restricted either by confessions of faith or by liturgical formularies." This constitution, won after so many arduous struggles, is in force at the present time in the Church of Geneva. To the Liberal party is furthermore due a whole series of measures derived from the principle laid down in the constitution of 1874, and which bears eloquent witness to the depth of the liberal convictions on matters of Church government and doctrine of the men who directed this religious and distinctly modern movement. There was, first of all, the publication of a Liturgy which has been spoken of as "Polychrome." It contained, for the forms of worship, prayers and formularies of a varied doctrinal character (Orthodoxy and Liberalism being represented in their differing shades). The success of this Liturgy has been such, both in Geneva and elsewhere, in the French-speaking churches, that several editions have already been exhausted.

Then, in the second place, the Church of Geneva has no official catechism, either for the use of communicants or for use in Sunday-schools or for religious instruction in State schools. Everywhere the minister is in the enjoyment of complete religious freedom.

Changed Aspects of Liberal Influence.

Since the date of the first promulgation of the liberal constitution of the Church of Geneva, religious liberalism has gone on ceaselessly developing; but not without passing through phases of a very diverse kind. At the outset, Liberalism had asserted itself vigorously as an ecclesiastical party; but now, for some years past, it has largely thrown off its party character, whilst, on the other hand, its doctrinal and ecclesiastical views have spread and deeply penetrated into those circles which had hitherto been attached to Orthodoxy.

The faculty of Theology in Geneva presents a fair reflection of the changes which have been gradually introduced into the Church of Geneva. After having consisted for long of a majority of liberal Professors, and even at one time being entirely under the sway of Liberalism, it consists at the present time of three liberal Professors, of one Professor representative of the Centre, and two belonging to the Right. But, taken as a whole, this Faculty shows itself to be influenced by the liberal spirit in religion and doctrine.

Religious Instruction in Geneva.

A point of interest to be noted in the life of the Church of Geneva, is seen in the development which religious instruction has received in its midst. This instruction, which is official indeed, but optional (parents being allowed full liberty in letting their children attend the course or not), is given in all the primary and secondary schools. Since 1888, a higher course of instruction, devoted to the study of the origin of Christianity, and likewise of the great non-Christian religions, has been introduced by the Consistory into the upper classes of the High Schools for boys and girls.*

We must, in conclusion, add that religious liberalism in Geneva has largely contributed, in late years, to scatter broadcast a whole host of important religious publications, and every winter it has continued to invite eminent lecturers (A. Sabatier, A. Réville, J. Réville, Chapuis, Buisson, &c.), who have drawn large and cultured audiences. And it is noteworthy, that prominent amongst these were representatives of the differing sections of the Orthodox body. It was at one of these courses that the late lamented Dean A. Sabatier gave an outline for the first time of his "Sketch of a Philosophy of Religion," which he published in 1897.

Conclusion.

And now, to sum up and draw to a close this all too brief and hurried survey. We find at the outset of the twentieth century, and noticeable alike in French-speaking and German-speaking Switzerland, the beneficial and active influence exerted by the liberal religious movement, and we record the solid progress that it has achieved. It has not escaped observation, that in recent years the liberal movement, considered in its ecclesiastical character, has lost ground (in spite of having won the victory on the battle-ground of the religious constitutions), but it none the less exerts its ascendancy, effectually and palpably, in the ranks of the new orthodoxy; that is to say, of an orthodoxy stripped of its intolerance and original narrowness. Such a result, we are persuaded, gives us ample ground for rejoicing. What, after all, does it matter whether we as individuals or as parties further the work, if only our ideas become triumphant! Thank God, who has bestowed so vigorous and fertile a life upon that religious Truth which we have drawn from the Bible, and which we evermore proclaim!

CALM soul of all things! make it mine
To feel, amid the city's jar,
That there abides a peace of thine
Man did not make, and cannot mar.

The will to neither strive nor cry,
The power to feel with others give!
Calm, calm me more! nor let me die
Before I have begun to live.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF RELIGIOUS LIFE AND THOUGHT IN AUSTRALIA.*

BY THE REV. R. H. LAMBLEY, M.A., OF MELBOURNE.

Religion in Australia is an imported article—that is to say, the sects and dogmas of the Old World have been perpetuated in these new southern lands. Hence there is very little that is distinctly Australian in the different aspects of religious life and thought; in most cases there is only an echo of voices that have spoken far away. The Anglican Church is, indeed, making an effort to establish a school of Australian theology, but it makes no great headway, and should it succeed, it would only be a sectarian school. The theological institutions of the country are not remarkable for their breadth, culture, or original output of men or books. The best of the men escape to Europe, and if they return at all it is with the image and superscription of Europe legibly stamped upon them. It has been said of the book trade of Australia that it exists to sell English books and periodicals; and an unkindly critic might say, with a large measure of truth, that the churches of Australia seem specially designed to perpetuate the divisions and "isms" of England. But it is difficult to see how this could have been otherwise under the actual circumstances.

The modifications that are being introduced are the product of a certain mobility of thought and a readiness to make experiments of which Europe knows little, and these again may be traced to the effect of climate upon character.

There are many signs of movement within the churches that prognosticate speedy changes of a far-reaching kind. This is specially true of the Presbyterian Churches. These churches have been federated, and one of the conditions of this federation was the revision of "the secondary standards of the Church." This is a great thing to have accomplished. But some of her most earnest members think that the Presbyterian Church is losing, if it has not already lost, its hold of the people, and is becoming more a racial church—Scotch and Irish. At present it represents a high standard of culture and of wealth, and consequently exercises great influence in the land.

The various sections of the Methodist Church have caught the spirit of the times and federated—the Act of Union will be consummated during the present year. Within their ranks also are pretty clear indications of change, and certain questions which have to be put to the ministers every year are asked with a conscious nervousness, and in such haste as scarcely to wait for an answer. The connection between them and the parent body is on the whole loyal and real; still it is obvious that the old traditions are weakening, and the cry for a new hymn-book, "made in Australia," is not without its significance. Here, as in Europe, Methodism just holds its own; no headway is made; two or three city centres in Victoria are very active in social work, and attract crowds to their services, but then these services are more like variety entertainments than religious worship.

The Anglican Church is mainly Evangelical; Ritualism and Sacerdotalism are indeed known, but in a very mild form. I am not aware that there is any such thing as an Anglican Broad Church party in Australia.

There are three Unitarian churches, none of them fifty years old, and none of them flourishing. Yet the strange fact is that Unitarians are rapidly increasing in number. I believe the census just taken in Victoria will show a very considerable increase in our numbers. But this increase does not better the condition of our churches, chiefly, I think, because the population is thinly scattered over the country districts, where many of our fellow-believers live, and where it is quite impossible to build churches. There are many Unitarians in Melbourne, possibly a thousand who will so describe themselves in the census, yet less than one-tenth attend our church.

The "Australian" Church formed in Melbourne several years ago has now some two or three branches in New South Wales. It is of local growth, and is broad and catholic. Its founder, the Rev. Charles Strong, D.D., is a very able and energetic man who has done a great work in Melbourne. In reply to my question he writes:—"We have, as you know, a pretty active church, and a congregation that sometimes numbers from 800 to 1,000, drawn from all churches and no church. I find earnest listeners, kind co-operators, and unselfish workers among the poor.

"I know men and women who are deeply interested in religion, and not merely as a speculative matter. I could tell you of members of Parliament to whom religion is a reality, of lawyers, business-men, and working-men who think, read, and feel; and of ladies not a few who are intelligent, liberal-minded, and devout.

"But my impression of religious life in Victoria as a whole is not very favourable. Church life seems to be at a low ebb, and what there is is not very high. The great burning questions of the day are ignored in the Church Assemblies, and poor petty matters, comparatively, seem to engross attention. One seldom meets with interest in the real religious questions on the part of the clergy. The laity in the Church Courts show little independence or living interest beyond business details of a denominational character. The professors and teachers in the small divinity schools do not bring forth much fruit.

"I question if our young people know anything about theological questions, or if any of them could even tell you what Presbyterian, Unitarian, Episcopalian, or even Roman Catholic really means. We have, as you know, a large number of Jews in Melbourne. As far as I can gather the synagogue is orthodox, and we have no reformed synagogue here.

"I come across sceptics as to the future, and sceptics as to God and religion, but I do not know that their number is greater here than elsewhere.

"The environment (which of course we partly make for ourselves) is not favourable to religious life and thought, or to church-going and living working churches. We live in an atmosphere of excitement. To use a vulgarism, we have always 'something on'—a land-boom, or a murder, or a divorce suit, or a war. We are given up to money-making and pleasure-seeking, eating, drinking, and luxury. Horse-racing and speculation and gambling are rampant. Altogether the atmosphere is depressing and unfavourable to sober-minded religious progress. The people, meanwhile, do not seem to care about anything serious. They love a fashionable concert, or a social scandal which the Press serves up for them, a horse-race, a cricket or football match, and so on; but I question if Jesus Christ would get much of an audience.

"Spiritualism has, I think, a good many followers, though at present one does not hear so much of it as a few years ago, and in the churches are to be found quiet believers in spiritualistic phenomena. Theosophy was for a time very prominent. I cannot tell to what extent its tenets prevail, but some of my friends are theosophists.

"There does seem to be within the last few years a liberalising spirit at work, though it is vague. Members of different churches become more tolerant of each other, and change is going on. But there is at present no whole-hearted intelligent effort to bring the Church into harmony with the new circumstances and knowledge of to-day. All I can say is that we seem to be drifting, and drifting on the whole towards change, whether for the worse or the better remains to be seen."

Dr. Strong's description is depressing, but its truth cannot be questioned by any one who knows the circumstances. It is said specially of Melbourne and Victoria, but is probably equally true of all the other states, although some modification would be necessary in the case of New Zealand and Tasmania.

On the whole, the outlook is not very promising; but at any time a change for the better may set in. In the meantime, the friends of the liberal movement must stand by their principles, and hearten each other as well as they can; and, above all, labour to bring about a revival of true religion.

A PRAYER FOR PEACE.

The Peace Manifesto agreed upon by a meeting of Free Church ministers at the Memorial Hall, adjourned from July 12, to secure a representative pronouncement, was forwarded on Friday of last week to Lord Salisbury, Sir H. Campbell Bannerman, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Chamberlain. The manifesto was signed up to that date by over 400 ministers, including the Revs. F. B. Meyer, Alexander McLaren, D.D., John Clifford, D.D., Alexander Mackennel, D.D., J. Monro Gibson, D.D., R. F. Horton, D.D., A. M. Fairbairn, D.D., and other representative Evangelical Nonconformists. It is, perhaps, because the manifesto is not thorough enough and bears evident marks of compromise, that the name of only one Unitarian minister (if one) appears among the signatures, in this first list. The text of the manifesto is as follows:—

I.—We, the undersigned, being ministers of Free Churches in Great Britain, are deeply concerned at the long continuance of the war in South Africa, and the inevitable suffering and embitterment of feeling thereby induced. We unite with the whole Church of Christ in the earnest prayer for peace, and recognise that nothing should be left undone to promote that sacred end and to remove any misunderstanding that may hinder the cessation of hostilities.

II.—We hail with great satisfaction the following resolution, agreed to without dissentient, at a meeting of Free Church ministers, held in the Memorial Hall, London, on Friday, July 12, at which all shades of opinion were represented: "This meeting is of opinion that the time has come when the strength of the Christian Church should be directed towards a constructive policy of peace."

In making this attempt we are encouraged by the recollection that it is according to the traditional and universal policy of our nation to confer the privileges of representative government and equal political rights on the white people, irrespective of nationality, within the British Empire; and to secure for the native races under our rule just and humane administration with protection of their rights as labourers.

III.—We are convinced that the speedy termination of the war will be best secured by the declaration on our part of a pacific purpose.

IV.—We venture to suggest that any policy of peace should have as its main and underlying principles:

(1) That there shall be nothing to retard or frustrate the future unity and amity of the peoples of South Africa. (2) That every security should be taken to prevent the recurrence of military strife. (3) That the invariable policy of the British Empire in the administration of its colonies should be adopted in the settlement of South Africa—namely, the concession of autonomy and self-government. (4) That there should be compensation for destroyed homes and farms to all who are able to establish a just claim. (5) And, further, we would recommend an amnesty as generous and far-reaching as possible, on condition of the immedate laying-down of arms and breaking up of all military organisation.

We urge that these principles should be authorised by the British people in the most convincing constitutional manner, and communicated to the leaders of the Boer forces; and that steps should be taken for the carrying out of these arrangements forthwith.

V.—We desire to assure our fellow-ministers of the Dutch Church of our brotherly regard, and appeal to them to use their great influence with those of their own blood and faith in the interests of an honourable peace.

We appeal, also, to all patriotic citizens to cultivate the sentiments that make for peace, and to our fellow-Christians to be unceasing in prayer to God, in whose hand the issues lie, that this war may be brought to an end, and the spirit of brotherhood prevail.

We profoundly sympathise with our brethren, the English-speaking ministers of South Africa, who are sorrowing over the effects of the war on their families and on their churches, and, at the same time, we express our confident belief that their Christian spirit will lead them to do all in their power to reconcile those now at enmity.

From a letter of Dr. Clifford's to the Daily News of Aug. 13, which published the list of names, we gather that signatures are still being received.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY EXTENSION SUMMER MEETING.

THE first part the tenth Summer Meeting organised by the Oxford Delegacy for the extension of teaching came to an end on Wednesday last. A larger number of students attended than has been known for many years, considerably over a thousand having registered their names, while Oxford residents were admitted to single lectures without being required to take tickets for the whole course. Many were old friends and supporters of the movement, and they declared that they were enjoying themselves more than ever. All parts of the kingdom were represented; there were students from various countries in Europe, from the Colonies, and the United States. Mr. Asquith's opening address supplied an introduction to the historical section of the lectures, concerned chiefly with Alfred and the early fortunes of Britain. The Bishop of Ripon followed the next night with a brilliant discourse on epic poetry (with especial reference to Dante), by way of illustration of a long series of lectures on the European epics, in which Mr. Arthur Sidgwick dealt with Homer, Mr. Warde Fowler with Vergil, and the President of Magdalen with Lucan. Language, science, art, education, all have been represented; and special arrangements have been made for economic conferences. At the first, Mr. Edward Bond, M.P., and Mrs. Bosanquet spoke on the Housing question; at the second Mr. C. S. Loch introduced the Old Age problem. Every sort of interest and taste has found here some satisfaction; and the crowds of eager students who gather in hundreds in the High-street before the doors of the Schools are open, testify eloquently to the enthusiasm which is effectively sustained from day to day.

Manchester College has made its own contribution to this great series of educational diversions. Mr. Fripp delivered two charming lectures on "The Old English Chronicles" before his engagement at a similar meeting at Marburg hurried him away from England. The large audience swarmed from the lecture-room into the chapel, filled the stalls, and sat on the steps. The subjects chosen by Mr. Carpenter to illustrate the recent advance in the study of Comparative Religion—"The Sacred Books of the East" and "Early Religious Philosophy in India"—were more remote from general interest; but the sixty odd hearers at the first lecture nearly doubled themselves at the third. On Sunday last the chapel was crowded both morning and evening, when Mr. Carpenter began a series of sermons and lectures, designed to show how far the principles of historical investigation, recognised in other fields by the extension lecturers, had been applied to the Gospels and the life and teaching of Christ. Taking for his subject in the evening the article on Jesus Christ in "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible," originally issued in 1863, and reprinted without alteration in the enlarged edition of the first volume eight years ago, Mr. Carpenter announced that he would trace the process by which the theological construction of the Archbishop was modified by Professor Sanday in "Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible" (1899), and practically set aside by the late Dr. Bruce in the "Encyclopædia Biblica" (1901). The second and third lectures of this series will be delivered to-morrow evening and on Sunday, the 25th. Finally, the College teaching received powerful reinforcement from Mr. Wicksteed, who selected for his subject "King Alfred as a Scholar and Translator." The sympathy already established between Mr. Wicksteed and so many students all over the country, partly accounted for the large attendance which again filled every part of the chapel at his first lecture. The masterly treatment of the topic, which was in fact an object-lesson in critical method (in which the lecturer's studies in the Old Testament evidently stood him in good stead), drew them again and again. As the President of a well-known Massachusetts college observed, "Mr. Wicksteed seemed to be inside his subject, and his subject inside him!" Many were the expressions of regret when the last morning came. Those who had gathered within the College walls at 9.15, assembled again in the great south school at noon to hear the same teacher on another theme—the Italian Epics. With a superb versatility Mr. Wicksteed passed from Tasso to Ariosto and from Ariosto to Dante, as if the minutiæ of Anglo-Saxon scholarship—the use of the dative absolute, the share of Alfred in rendering Boethius or Orosius—had not possessed his mind two hours before, while Professor York Powell and the Danish invasion had occupied it in the interval. The lecturer held the immense assemblage for his appointed time, without a note beyond half a page of syllabus, as he poured out the results of concentrated study and thought in a strain at first easy and colloquial, then rising into loftier eloquence. Who is the hero of the Divina Commedia? he asked. Not Dante, was the answer, nor humanity; but the reader, who was made sympathetically to accompany the poet, and to hear in every utterance of judgment or of hope and joy the penetrating words "thou art the man."

I OBSERVED to——that the world, that human life, that our own sins and weaknesses, found us daily and hourly occasions for exercising patience and self-denial; that life is not entirely made up of great evils or heavy trials, but that the perpetual recurrence of petty evils and small trials is the ordinary and appointed exercise of the Christian graces. To bear with the feelings of those about us, with their perverse tempers; to endure neglect where we feel we have deserved attention; to meet ingratitude where we have expected thanks; to bear with the company of disagreeable people, whom Providence has placed in our way, and whom He has, perhaps, provided on purpose for the trial of our virtue; these are the best exercises, and the better because not chosen by ourselves. To bear with vexations in business, with disappointments in our expectations, with interruptions, disturbances, in short with whatever opposes our will and contradicts our humour; this habitual acquiescence appears to be more of the essence of self-denial than any little rigours of our own imposing; these constant, inevitable, but inferior evils properly improved, furnish a good moral discipline. —H. More.

THE INWARD LIFE.

I have spoken of the realm of feeling and sentiment as the subsoil in which religion has its root—in which, as I believe, it will always have its root, into whatever of fairer leafage and flower and fruit it shall grow. But the warm spring mould is not the only agency in the development of a seed. No; nor is the emotional nature in man the only factor in religion and a developed religious faith. The air and sunlight must contribute to the plant's growth; the light of knowledge and widening thought must atmosphere these basic elements of feeling and give direction and ever-enlarging scope to faith. Of themselves these reach up blindly, like rank and tender vines, needing guidance and support and as ready else to sprawl upon the ground as to climb. The difference between a meditation of Fénélon and the attitude of a Pacific Islander before his image of wood or stone is not primarily one of feeling, but rather of the degree to which feeling in them has been educated and guided by intelligence; and to-day the difference between the fairer and finer expressions of religion and its still crude and very imperfect types is measured by the proportion and balance in which feeling and thought are given each its part. A bird with one wing is a poor creature for flight, and the man who can feel but cannot reason and reflect, or who can reason and reflect but has lost the power to feel, will not rise to that point of vision from which life's larger meaning opens to his view in wonder and beauty and joy.

This is the synthesis to be sought. I think its need is gaining recognition to-day in the better minds both among those who are classed as orthodox, and those who are classed as liberal. Already this recognition is creating a felt fellowship of the Spirit that is doing much to obliterate the hard-and-fast lines hitherto drawn by these terms. There is on the one hand a lessening regard for that exaggerated emotionalism which once was considered the supreme evidence of religious experience, and on the other hand there is a deepened sense of what Professor Tyndall, in his famous Belfast address, characterised as "the immovable basis of religious sentiment in the emotional nature of man." "To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction," this great scientist considered "the problem of problems at the present hour." It is for us, as a group of free churches, to recognise the new conditions and to ally ourselves with, and, so far as we may, to teach the constructive forces of our time.

Mohammed is reported to have said, "There are two things which I abhor—the learned in his infidelities, and the fool in his devotions." We will not say this, realising that doubts at times beset the wisest and most devout, realising also that before any and every sincere expression of the soul's hunger and need intelligent sympathy is better and nobler than the scornful cry of "Thou fool!" Of all attitudes, that of scorn towards a fellow-being is least akin to the love of truth and farthest from the love of God. But while there have been and are signal individual illustrations, yet on the wider scale it may be said that the religion which worships a God of light and of love is still in the dim morning of its day. We may outgrow our worships; indeed, in the progress of religion we must do so. But worship itself we may not outgrow.

Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell,
That mind and soul, according well,
May make one music as before,
But vaster.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

The Message of the Flowers.—II.

"But what happened to the others?"

"Oh," replied the old rose, "I remember there were some more cut on the same day. They were just taken into the house and put in vases in one of the rooms."

"Whatever good could they do?" inquired a flower to whom it seemed that theirs must be a very unhappy fate.

"Oh, a great deal," replied the old rose gently. "They all looked very beautiful and smelt very sweet. The room seemed to be full of them. Everyone who went in exclaimed 'How lovely those roses are!'"

"But I don't see much good in that," persisted the young rose who had spoken before.

"Don't you?" was the answer. "If you had been there and seen what fair thoughts they put into people's minds, how they made them better-tempered and kinder to one another, you would have seen a great deal of good in it. And I think that if we can do that, it's worth living for, don't you?"

Even the flower that had complained agreed heartily with the rest that it was, and hoped that she might soon be cut, so that she could go somewhere and do some one good.

"Ah!" went on the old rose, "but we can't always give our message so easily. It may be very difficult. I remember that another of my sister roses, perhaps the finest of us all, was picked by Mary's brother Henry as he went out one morning to business, whatever that may be; the wind who told me about it said, 'He put it in his buttonhole,' and we all felt sorry for our sister, but glad that it was not one of us."

"Why was that?" asked the timid little sick rose, who herself would never be picked, shyly. She thought they would all have been eager to go, after what the old rose had been saying.

"You may well ask," answered the old rose. "We were wrong, but we thought we had a good reason. It wasn't because he put her in his buttonhole. That is one of the things we should wish for most, because it brings us so near to people, and makes it easier to talk to them and deliver our message. And then, if only they will listen, we are able to keep them from thinking ugly thoughts and doing wicked deeds. We make the day very happy for them. No; we were sorry because we knew he was a bad boy, and didn't care at all for the beauty of your sister, and wouldn't listen to a word she said. He only put her there to show other people what fine roses his father grew, so that they should envy him, and say how fortunate he was. We felt sure that would make her very sad, and that she might die without having done any good, and so we were sad too."

"And didn't he listen at all?" asked the rose anxiously. And they all bent towards the old rose to hear the answer, for it seemed a very dreadful thing that a rose should die without having done any good.

"Yes," was the reply, "he did. But it was in a strange manner. He thought and said many evil things that day that would have grieved his father and mother, who didn't believe he was half so bad as he really was. My sister tried, oh! so hard, to make him listen to her. But he took no notice at all; and at night, when he reached home tired and cross, she was withered and nearly dead. He took her out of his buttonhole and was about to throw her away when at length he heard her speak. It was only a whisper, for she hadn't much strength left, but it was her last chance, and she spoke so earnestly that, hardened as he was, he couldn't help hearing. 'Harry, if you don't give up your wicked thoughts and habits your life will soon be withered like mine.' Withered like that! Yes; he knew it must be. His conscience told him so at once. Then he began to feel ashamed of himself, and broke into tears, and said aloud, 'No; my life shall never be withered like that.' And he went down on his knees, as he had not done for years, and prayed God to forgive him, and to help him to be better, and purer, and nobler. When my rose sister heard that she was filled with joy, and died smiling. She had delivered her message and been heard."

"But does it ever happen that our message is not heard at all?" asked one who had been listening very attentively.

"Ah, that I don't know," answered the old rose. "Sometimes it seems like it. Look at me now. Nobody has taken much if any notice of me. I have lived all my days here, and shall soon fall to pieces. But I always comfort myself with the thought that I have done the best I could. I have looked as beautiful as I was able, and made the air as sweet about me as possible. Perhaps some one is the better for me of whom I know nothing. And I am sure God only wants us to do the best we can wherever we are. But I do wish some one had picked me and given me such a chance as I hope you will all have."

"Oh, but," they said, "if you had gone too, who could have told us all these wonderful things? Perhaps God meant you to be left here just to teach us."

"It is kind of you to think that," said the old rose. "And it really may be so. Anyway, you may be quite certain that we all, even our little sick sister here, have our message to deliver. It is always the same, although we do it in different ways: to put into the minds of boys and girls and men and women beautiful thoughts, and to fill their hearts with love. We have to tell them to make one another happy, and so be happy themselves, by doing good. You won't mind what happens to you now, will you?"

"Oh, no, indeed," they said. "We will gladly go anywhere if only we can deliver our message and be heard. There is nothing else worth living for."

I don't know what they said to one another after that. But somehow the sunshine seemed brighter, and the butterflies lovelier, and the songs of the birds sweeter, and the roses more gay and joyful. It was very wonderful to think that they knew God had given them their beauty to make the world a sweeter and a better place, by making boys and girls and men and women kinder and truer and more loving.

REVEALER AND REVEALED.

THE two sermons in the second volume of Dr. MARTINEAU'S Hours of Thought on "CHRIST, the Divine Word" have naturally a great attraction for earnest students of the writings of our great Teacher. Their date cannot be exactly fixed, but the volume was published in 1879, and the sermons were selected from what we may take to be the ripest fruits of Dr. MARTINEAU'S ministry in London, before he had reached his seventieth year, but when he had already attained to the full maturity of his splendid powers.

The sermons should be studied in the light of the address to his old students, on "Loss and Gain in recent Theology," given two years after their publication. In that address he spoke of JESUS as "Simply the Divine flower of humanity, blossoming after ages of spiritual growth—the realised possibility of life in GOD," and as "the Head of a divine humanity"; while on the last page of the Endeavours after the Christian Life, in what was originally the second volume, published in 1847, we have a fore-shadowing of the sermons on "CHRIST, the Divine Word."

Not more clearly does the worship of the saintly soul, breathing through its window opened to the midnight, betray the secrets of its affections—than the mind of Jesus of Nazareth reveals the perfect thought and inmost love of the All-ruling God. Were he the only-born—the solitary self-revelation—of the Creative Spirit, he could not more purely open the mind of Heaven; being the very Logos—the apprehensible nature of God—which, long unuttered to the world, and, abiding in the beginning with Him, has now come forth, and dwelt among us full of grace and truth.

In the later sermons we read that JESUS revealed "the perfect relation between the human soul and the Divine," for in him the Divine influence, which touches and moves in us also, "spread till it covered the whole soul and brought the human into moral coalescence with the Divine." Thus in CHRIST GOD was "personally there, giving expression to his spiritual nature, as in the visible universe to his causal power."

What this does not mean may be seen in a passage, beginning on p. 211.

Whoever conceives that God in person came and lived the human life, and so dwelt in the villages of Galilee and the courts of Jerusalem, as to be in the least withdrawn from Thessaly and Rome, from the planets or the Pleiades, has a faith worthy of the Lycaonian peasants, who took Barnabas for Jupiter and Paul for Mercury. The Infinite cannot become finite, the Eternal retire into time, the ocean of everlasting power turn into one of its own mountain streams.

And we must surely feel that GOD is as truly personally there in our less perfect lives, stirring in the secret places of our conscience, our love and aspiration, as in the soul of JESUS; for when we recognise the full significance of his life, it is because the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of GOD—"heirs of GOD, and joint-heirs with CHRIST." It is GOD who reveals CHRIST to us; and then in the light of his completer manhood our knowledge of the FATHER'S will, our trust in Him is made complete.

A visible person entirely holy, living and dying in simple trust and pure obedience, loving nothing but what is dear to God, pitying what is sad before him, and severe only to the guilt that lies beneath his frown; a being of sweet and tender humanities, yet transfigured with the intimate converse of divine realities; a spirit, in short, at once grand and gracious as that of Jesus; bears down upon us with a persuasion which neither the whispers of our natural heart, nor the thunders of supernatural power, can ever exercise. Such a one stands openly between our thought and God. Whom else would we choose to represent our aspirations to him, saying, "Lord, this is what we mean, when we sigh and pray and trust?" And whom else could he send to show us the approaches to himself, and set us in the true direction for the highest of all; saying, "Behold my servant whom I uphold; my chosen in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon him?" Such a mediatorial mind, rising to view like the dreams of conscience and of prayer set in the very sunshine before our eye, becomes to us an objective Revelation, scattering our doubts of God and giving authoritative truth to the faint oracle of our better selves. (Hours of Thought.—II., p. 215-16.)

But while JESUS is thus recognised as "a mediatorial mind," it is that, when he has done his work, he may leave us alone with the FATHER. Thus in the sermon on "The God of the Living," preached in 1864, at the opening of Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, Dr. MARTINEAU spoke of the position which JESUS has opened to us "of direct relation, face to face, with the FATHER of Spirits," so that we are "apart from those who put not only a Past but a Present Mediator between." Yet he recognised an inner sympathy with those who held the other view.

The confession which we bring, and the repose which we find, are the same that are everywhere familiar to the heart of Christendom; only with us they seem to go and come straightway in primary converse with the Soul of souls; while others fear that, without interceding agency, they must miss their way.

One more passage we will quote, and so for this week leave the matter for, as we trust, further fruitful consideration. This passage is from the Induction charge to the Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON, in Hope-street Church, December, 1863 :—

Christ first becomes a Revelation to us, "the power of God and the wisdom of God," when he is preached, not in his solitary individuality, but as standing for our humanity for ever; taking the veil away that hid the Holy Presence there, interpreting for us the double nature of the Self that is ours and the Spirit that is His, and finding the way of reconciliation by surrender of will and utter sacrifice. We all of us have that twofold filiation which has been falsely fixed on him alone. Born of nature, born of God, we, too, must traverse the desert and meet the fiends of temptation: we have a baptism to be baptised with; and how are we straightened until it be accomplished! We have the path of self-denial to tread, and the midnight watch to meet, and the heavy cross to bear upon the dolorous way; only never alone, for the Father is with us: and passing freely into his hand to seek our own will no more, we shall not be without our moments of transfiguration and saintly communion; or the joy that deep things, hid from the wise and prudent, are revealed to the little child; or the angel of peace that strengthens for the last sacrifice. It is not the story of Jesus, not his picture, not his doctrine, that redeems us; not anything set off at a distance and taken at second-hand: all this first becomes a spiritual power when it carries us past itself into that intimate union with God which it exhibits as our true life. And so, to "preach Christ" is to take the veil from what is divine in man's experience, and bring him to the consciousness of real and living relations with the holiest of all. (Essays, Vol. IV., pp. 543-4.)

A MAN is relieved and gay when he has put his heart into his work and done his best; but what he has said or done otherwise shall give him no peace.—Emerson.

SHE doeth little kindnesses,
Which most leave undone, or despise;
For nought that sets one heart at ease,
And giveth happiness and peace,
Is low-esteemèd in her eyes.

Blessing she is: God made her so,
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow;
Nor hath she ever chanced to know
That ought were easier than to bless.

JESUS AND HIS FRIENDS AT THE SPRINGS OF JORDAN.*

BY THE REV. W. J. JUPP.

"And Jesus went forth, and his disciples, into the villages of Cæsarea Philippi: and in the way he asked his disciples, saying unto them, Who do men say that I am?"—Mark viii. 27.

THEY were in the extreme north of Palestine, under the slopes of Hermon. Beyond, and still farther north, are the mountains, valleys, and streams of Lebanon and anti-Lebanon. To the north-east the Syrian hills reach onward to the plains of Damascus. Southwards the wide Jordan valley falls away toward the Waters of Merom and the Lake of Galilee. Westward are the wild, uneven heights that continue almost to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon and the Mediterranean Sea.

This region of Cæsarea Philippi, called Banias by the Arabs (recovering thus the ancient Greek name, Paneas), is probably the farthest north to which Jesus and his disciples ever journeyed. It is not often visited now, except by travellers from Tiberias or Safed to Damascus and Palmyra. The journey hither is long and toilsome. Yet no spot in Palestine better repays the trouble of reaching it. The exceeding beauty and fertility of the place; its abundant ruins and records of a remote past; its connection with one of the most critical moments in the life of a great prophet—these things give to the whole scene a significance and charm, hardly surpassed by any other in that strange land.

Vainly must the returned pilgrim hope to give any clear vision of the scene, or any full account of the thoughts and impressions which came to him there. To know the interest and fascination of the place one must travel many days over the rough and stony hills of Judæa, Samaria and Galilee, through the long, low, sultry valley of the Upper Jordan, and then, on some fair clear Syrian morning, come upon the fertile fields, the abounding waters, the tumbled ruins, the quaint irregular Arab dwellings—all grouped or "composed" there, at the head of the valley, under the craggy hills, with the splendid mass of Hermon towering above and commanding the whole scene. Then one knows and feels and is taken captive. The freshness and majesty of Nature blend with the decay and desolation and quaintness of human things, strangely impressive. The hills are so wild and rugged, the waters so affluent and vocal, the grass and flowers and foliage so fresh and bright, the ruins so picturesque, and the native houses so curiously nestled among them, and, withal, the air is so pure and bracing, the climate so pleasant, that one might almost be pardoned for calling it ideal, just for a minute. It was an ideal place for the Great Prophet of the Ideal to sojourn in, with his few friends, ere the last decisive movement of his life was determined, and his face steadfastly set towards Jerusalem, where the Prophet's destiny of sacrifice must be fulfilled.

You will believe that it was an experience, not soon to be forgotten, to be encamped there one evening on an open grassy plain, a few hundred yards above the main Jordan stream, with the sound of its flowing waters coming up the valley, filling the twilight air with a peaceful and soothing murmur! To tired limbs and busied, wondering, not quite unanxious thoughts, that sound was as sweet music that brings solace and contentment to the mind. And one could not but reflect that that was the sound they must have heard when they came hither to be quiet and safe for a while from the importunity of the people and from the pursuing enmity of Priest and Pharisee. It was the sound, too, which they would hear when their steps turned towards Jerusalem again, the Master knowing, or at least expecting, that that journey would be the last, and would end in his own death.

There was nothing, indeed, in the scene itself to remind one that he had ever sojourned there. Signs of the Greek and Roman and Herodian and Crusader were abundant—ruins that told of worldly splendour and ambition—but nothing visible to recall the presence of the lowly Galilean; no sign, ancient or modern, to suggest that once he came into that fair region with his disciples; that there he asked the searching question, "Who say ye that I am?" and heard the quick response, "Thou art the Christ"; that then he made the calm resolve to go back to the city, and accept the doom which the world appoints, and God permits, to the holiest of our race. Curious and significant that, while tradition or devotion could fix on so many spots and mark them sacred, as connected with some incident of his life or death, this should have been forgotten or ignored. Yet it is well so. It leaves the mind more free to muse and ponder over things that are of real and lasting interest. And I knew that while the men whose works, still splendid in their ruins there, had passed away and were as nothing to the world, Jesus, in the thoughts and deeds and spirit of his life, was living still—a vital and effective force in that soul of moral progress, to which all that is best in ourselves, and in the great world of to-day, belongs.

This district of Cæsarea Philippi was far distant from the scenes of the Galilean ministry. And it seemed strange at first, when I knew how long and wearying was the journey thither, from the Vale of Gennesareth, that Jesus should have come so far, for those few days. But he had been wandering much for many weeks before, so the records seem to imply. It may be, as some think, he had been almost driven from the old familiar haunts. His enemies had become active and persistent. The people were foolish and disappointing—sometimes troublesome and annoying. They wanted to make him a King. They could not understand his real purpose. They could not receive his message. And "many of his disciples," it is said, "went back and walked no more with him." Even to the twelve, the Fourth Gospel tells us, he had turned to ask, "Will ye also go away?" as if he had begun to doubt their devotion and their faith. So he had left the well-known scenes, by the lake shore and hillsides of Galilee, and had wandered westward and northward to the regions of Tyre and Sidon. And from thence he had come to this remote place, beneath the slopes of Hermon, by the sources of the old Jordan stream. And there, at last, he puts that question which perhaps through all those wanderings had been pressing to his lips: "Who do men say that I am?" and then, turning it swiftly and directly upon them, "But who say ye that I am?"

Great thoughts lay behind those questionings, doubtless, struggling in his own mind. It may be, as some have held, that wavering and hesitation, as to his own high calling and commission, were lurking painfully there. For, in truth, it is hard, even to the highest prophet, always to believe in himself and his ministry, when no one seems to care for the things he most loves and labours to express.

But I could more readily believe that he felt in his own heart, strongly as ever, the divine elective grace which had called him to preach that fresh and fair ideal of life, destined to be so closely associated with his name. Only the hour had come when he must search and see if any of those who heard and followed him were assured of this, and could answer to his appeal. Had they, even any of these his few and faithful comrades, felt the inspiration, and known the power, of the Spirit which made him, though not without reproach, "a teacher sent from God?" For the prophet, in the hour of supreme crisis, does need to find some faith in himself or in his message, some clear response to that which, for his own heart, is so greatly true. The strongest must know the longing for fellowship in the ministry of righteousness and love. Moreover, a great thought, a high moral ideal, cannot be effective so long as it abides alone in the seer's own mind. It must find an answer of some kind, in some other soul ere it can work and begin to prevail in the world. But if only one receive it, frankly and with generous impulse, there is hope, and the seer may take comfort, and will no more complain, even though called himself to die for his idea.

I cannot, therefore, think of Jesus as a fugitive here, by the fountains of Jordan, driven from the familiar scenes and populous thoroughfares by his own doubts and misgivings, nor as an exile, fleeing from his enemies and forsaking in despair the ministry laid upon him by the Spirit of the Highest. It is more natural to think of him as seeking, amid fresh scenes and quiet surroundings, liberty and leisure to ponder the strange issues of his work among the people—seeking also the occasion to search his disciples' hearts, and know if they, at least, had understood at all, and were receptive of the hope he had cherished so well.

"Who say ye that I am?" "Thou art the Christ." It was enough, and he asks no more. One, at least, and he an Israelite, had recognised in the preacher of a gospel of meekness, sympathy and love, the Messiah of the nation; and the Master is content. That nation, as a whole, had, he knew full well, through its priests and its populace, rejected him. He was not their Ideal of a Messiah; he was no deliverer for them. They wanted a prince and a leader of quite other mould than this herald of simple and unceremonial religion, this preacher of lowliness and peace, the friend of sinners and lover of child-like things. "Your forms and ceremonies," he had told them, "are vain; your national pride and hatred of enemies and worship of the letter of the law—this is not religion, this will not make men good or great. God will have mercy and not sacrifice, purity of heart and not long prayers and pompous ritual of service. Worship God in spirit and in truth; love your enemies and do good to them that hate you; resist not him that is evil; he that is greatest among you let him be your servant; blessed are the poor in spirit; blessed are the gentle; blessed are the pure in heart; it is more blessed to give than to receive."

Thus had he spoken, and thus had he lived; but not thus did the people expect their Christ to come. This was not the voice of a Messiah for their nation. They looked for a leader who could draw the sword and muster armies, who could teach them, like Moses, to love their neighbour and hate their enemy, one who, like the Maccabæan, could rouse the people at his call to gird themselves for battle, and throw off the foreign yoke, and become once more a powerful nation, holding their own against the world. Therefore they had rejected him, and his ministry, it seemed, had come to nought.

But now, here was one—and perhaps he spoke for others—who could call him Christ, in the day of desertion and apparent defeat. Here was one who had found the Messiah in a teacher of meekness, in a friend of the lowly and a lover of the lost. That was enough, and at once his resolve was taken, and his face was set toward Jerusalem, the stronghold of his foes. He would go there and in the midst of those that hated him would speak again the inmost truth of his heart, and, if need be, die for it, knowing that his thought would not die, but would rise again in the life and love of those who should feel the inspiration of his spirit and answer to the call of his appealing grace.

So, at least, I understood this ancient record, as I read it there, a few weeks ago, amid those scenes of living beauty and those ruins of bygone splendour, in the place where the question was put and answered, and the high resolve was taken, no more to be surrendered or withdrawn.

And afterwards, musing on it all, while following southwards the path he trod on the way to the city where they crucified him, it seemed to have a meaning for us to-day—if in very truth we too have an ideal worth living for, in face of the world's indifference or the proud man's scorn. For every one who greatly cares for righteousness and human fellowship, and the faith of a pure and undefiled religion, is a Messiah, a Christ of God. And if, in times of worldliness and selfish greed, when the armies of "Christian" nations grow apace, and lust of power increases, when men strive for wealth as if riches were the highest good, and nations strive for territory as if a people's well-being consisted in the breadth of its possessions and the vastness of its rule—if to-day, amid all this, you can still believe in peace and brotherhood, in kindness and compassion, in service more than in sovereignty, in justice and charity more than in riches or renown, then the spirit of the Lord is upon you also, and you are called to be a Messiah, a prophet of the great Ideal. And you shall surely find some others who believe in and respond to your hope; and you may have fellowship of soul with them, and go in the strength of that fellowship to fulfil the ministry, and achieve some part of the purpose, of life's holier dream.

Times have changed since Jesus appealed to his friends for sympathy with his unpopular and despised Ideal. They have been changed by him. His own message of human love and gentleheartedness, sealed and consecrated in death, has leavened the world—a little. Peace and goodwill are more at home on earth because of him. The lover is not always flouted. The "Son of Man" has somewhere "to lay his head" now. Except in rare cases, such as threatened to disgrace England a while ago, a man may live and work here for the truth Christ taught, unmolested and not much disturbed. He may find himself, in his religious belief, his social enthusiasms, his national aspirations, little esteemed; he may hear himself called by unpleasing names, such as heretic, dreamer, traitor, or fool. But this will not matter. Let him hold to his ideal, and he will not be alone. Let him speak his thought and some will respond. Above all, let him resolutely live for the truth he sees to be highest and noblest, and take the consequences of that without flinching. Let him not be impatient or angry with others who have not his ideal, not though they scorn and despise it. If some, even of those who claim to be followers of the Christ of Galilee, who "profess and call themselves Christians," still reject his gospel of love and peace and world-wide fellowship—no matter. That is their concern, not yours, not mine. But if this religion of sympathy and compassion, of lowliness and delight in service, be our ideal of life, then to be quietly, patiently, persistently true to it, is our concern, and it is a great one. And they who are true shall not want for comrades and companions by the way, and they shall not miss the joy which no other joy can equal, nor the sorrow which no other sorrow can surpass in sacredness. For still is it true that, "Blessed are they that mourn (for the world's sad ways), for they shall be comforted"; and "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled"; and "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God."

"WE WOULD SEE JESUS."

BY THE REV. ROBERT COLLYER.

I remember a face I saw in the cathedral in Cologne, done on a panel, the verger said, in the fifth century of our era. It was a face of Jesus, dim now with age, woe-worn and shorn of strength or beauty, so that the thing touched me with dismay, and I said in my heart, This may have been the ideal of his face in the closing scenes of the great tragedy, but I would like to find another portrait of him in the earlier years, as he appears in our Gospels, before the shadows of the cross and passion began to touch his soul—the man so radiant, so strong, and, when the need came, so masterful, yet so tender withal, and sweet. This seems to be only the man the prophet saw in his vision, and said, "He shall grow up as a root out of a dry ground, with no form nor comeliness in him; and, when we see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him." I cannot be content with this likeness alone of one who seems to be dying of a wasting sickness or those eyes looking out on a world he has done with for ever; for, of all the sons of God, he stands first to my own vision as the perfect man and the instance of whatever is noblest and finest in our human form and presence.

Indeed, I have heard since then of a fresco found in an old chapel underground, not far from Rome, which holds another likeness, as the devout heart saw him in the mirror of, it may be, an earlier tradition—a man of strong presence and a noble stature, a born king of men, a face on which there was no blemish and with a ruddy bloom on a ground colour, like ripe wheat. This must be the youth and the man, I said, of the earlier years, and in the home where, as the Third Gospel tells us, "the child waxed strong in spirit and stature and in favour both with God and man." A child there in the home, running free in the spring-time and the summer, drinking in the delight of the brave, new world, while laughter breaks forth from the wells in his heart; gathering the lilies in the meadows, and listening to the birds, or playing with his mates in the market-place—a memory he touches in one of his monologues years after with so fine a felicity; blooming forth from childhood to youth, while the neighbours cannot remember he ever went to school, even to learn his letters. And this may be true; but it must be also true that he learned his lessons from the great mother, Nature, and the simple human life in which he was born and reared to his manhood, that he was to hide in the parables; watching the house-mother, in the home, making the bread and mending the garments, and the poor woman—no doubt a neighbour—seeking the mite of silver, sweeping the earthen floor so carefully that she may find it; watching the careful old father store his wine in the autumn, the shepherd bringing home the one lost sheep, the ploughman draw the clean fair furrow—not looking backward, but only forward—and the hen gather her chickens under her wings, with her cry of alarm while the hawk was but a speck in the blue above.

These things, and more besides than I have time to name, must have been stored among the lessons he learned as the boy and the youth bloomed forth from the child, waxing strong in spirit and stature, and in favour both with God and man, with the mother to watch over him and the father in due time to teach him his own craft of carpenter and builder; and so, if it is true that he never learned his letters, this is also true, as our own good poet sings, that

> The spirit that from God is made,
> The noblest of its kind,
> Asks not the help of rules that serve
> To guide the feebler mind.
> It soars, however far its flight,
> Right onward, safe and free,
> And all that schools and books can teach
> In its own soul can see.

Nor can I feel quite content again with Holman Hunt's noble picture, in which the young carpenter stands in the workshop when his day's work is done, stretching out those tired arms that in the sunset makes the shadow of a cross on the floor, if the artist would have us imagine the shadow had already touched him as the penumbra of his doom. The shadow must lie far away when he stands there ready to go forth on his holy mission at the call from on high. It is the son of man who, so far as we can touch the secret of the thirty years, had known no sickness or wasting in the spring of his life; the son of man and of God who loved the Father's world, and saw his hand in the cup of the lily, growing by his grace at its own sweet will, and in the bird on the wing up there among the green arches or fallen dead on the ground. There is no woe or wasting then and there like that I saw on the old panel. His human nature and life is attuned to a perfect harmony, as I think of him and see him. Nor can I think of a time, apart from what will befall, when the glory and beauty of the world will pale for him, and his love for it will sink down to some meaner level—this young man who of all men was one with the sunshine and the shadow as alike from God, with nature and life, with wholesome men and women and little children—or a time when the sun will shine no more for him with the old splendour nor the lilies be as lovely as they are in his Sermon on the Mount, when the happy noises of life will jar on his ears and heart, and all the good things of God become subject to the discount which comes to so many with their life at ebb-tide. This is the Jesus I love to look on as he stands ready to answer Here! at the call of the Most High.

DERWENTWATER PRESERVATION.

SIR,—I have read with pleasure your admirable article on the scheme for preserving a portion of the western shore of Derwentwater. I am glad to say that several donations have already reached me from your readers.

May I ask you to make known through your columns that a gentleman has offered £100 towards the purchase, on condition that nine other donors will each give a like sum?

OCTAVIA HILL.

190, Marylebone-road, N.W., Aug. 13.

WE have also received a note from Canon Rawnsley with the good news that one of the nine has already accepted the challenge to which Miss Octavia Hill refers in the above letter; and have since heard of a third £100. Last week Canon Rawnsley, dating from Crosthwaite Vicarage, Keswick, on August 7, addressed a letter to the Daily Press, appealing to summer holiday-makers to consider what they would be doing, if they would help in this purchase scheme. We are glad to publish here the greater part of that letter:—

"If it chance that at any time they feel the beauty and the freedom of foot in some entrancing scene quicken their pulses and bring the smile to their lips, will they think of the possibility they have of securing just such pleasure for tens of thousands of their fellow-countrymen in the generations yet to be, by sending a subscription, or promise of subscription, towards the purchase of a mile of the western shore of Derwentwater, for which the National Trust is now raising the necessary funds? We have only a limited time in which the purchase money, £6,500, can be collected, and we need £2,500 still. Is there anyone who would wish to perpetuate the memory of some dear friend by a gift of an acre of the 108 acres we are purchasing? If so, the way is open. We spend large sums in costly and perishable monuments to the dead; here, on the shore of Derwentwater, the gift of £60 would purchase a memorial whose blessing and whose charm for the weary worker on his too short holiday would be perpetual.

"We have committees at work in Leeds, in Manchester, in Liverpool, in Birmingham, and in Keswick, but nothing has touched me more than letters enclosing 2s. or 2s. 6d. from bonâ-fide working-men in our great Northern cities, who say, 'I had a day's outing on Derwentwater five years ago, and in memory of it I send you a small subscription, and I will ask my mates and see what I can do.' One man sent £1 with this short note, 'I am blind, and I am dying, but I once saw Derwentwater many years ago, and I beg to send you a sovereign for the good object.' It is for the blind and the dying we appeal—men who live in the half-darkness of city smoke, and whose souls are withering for want of communion with that spirit of Nature whose glory is revealed by just such a shore as the shore of Derwentwater. We ask all holiday-makers in this August season who feel the good of being where hills and woods and lakes can speak in their unfailing language to the heart, to aid us who are resolved to keep this bit of lake-land shore in its loveliness and calm for the rest and refreshment of far-off generations."

Subscriptions may be sent to Canon Rawnsley, or to Miss Octavia Hill, at the addresses given above. Cheques and Postal Orders to be crossed "National Provincial Bank of England."

THE National Trust, of which the Marquis of Dufferin is President, and Canon Rawnsley the Hon. Secretary, since its formation in 1895, has, by purchase or gift, acquired the following properties, which are held for the benefit of the nation:—

(a) Lands and Buildings.

(The dates mark the year of acquisition.)

1895. BARMOUTH.—The beautiful cliff known as "Dinas-o-leu," overlooking the Estuary at Barmouth. It is 4½ acres in extent, and was presented to the Trust by Mrs. Fanny Talbot.

1897. BARRAS HEAD.—Fifteen acres of cliff land at Tintagel, on the North Cornish coast, looking on to the magnificent pile of rocks on which stand the ruins of King Arthur's Castle. Purchased for £505, from the late Earl of Wharncliffe, the money being raised by means of donations.

1896. ALFRISTON, SUSSEX.—A pre-Reformation Clergy or Priests' House, purchased in a very delapidated condition for £10, and put into thorough repair for about £350, raised by donations. The Clergy House is about eight miles from Eastbourne, and a visit to it forms a pleasant excursion for visitors to that town.

1897. SALISBURY.—The Joiners' Hall, supposed to be the Hall of one of the old City Livery Companies, dating from about 1550. Purchased by a loan on which interest is payable.

1898. TOY'S HILL.—Land on a Kentish hill-side, overlooking the Weald, given to the Trust in memory of Mr. Frederick Feeney, by Mr. and Mrs. Richardson Evans. The first realisation of the idea, suggested by the Trust, that memorials should sometimes take the form of beautiful scenery. Some land adjacent to the above was given to the Trust by Miss Octavia Hill.

1899. WICKEN FEN.—Two strips of land, together containing about four acres, the first purchased for £10, from Mr. J. C. Moberley, of Southampton, the second given to the Trust by the Hon. N. Charles Rothschild. Wicken Fen is almost the last remnant of the primeval fenland of East Anglia, and is of special interest to entomologists and botanists, on account of the rare insects and plants found there.

1899. IDE HILL.—Fifteen acres of wooded hill-side, five miles from Sevenoaks. Purchased for £1,636 18s. 6d., by means of donations.

1899. DUFFIELD CASTLE.—Remains of the keep of the "Castle of the Ferrars," with pleasure ground attached. Presented by the Hon. F. Strutt and G. H. Strutt, Esq. Under the care of the Parish Council.

1900. KANTURK CASTLE.—A fortress of the O'Donoughues, between Kanturk and Banteer, Co. Cork. Presented by Lucy, Dowager Countess of Egmont.

1900. LONG CRENDON, BUCKS.—The old Court House or Staple Hall. Purchased for a nominal sum from the co-owners, Lady Kinloss, All Souls' College, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Donations raised for purchase and repair.

(b) Monuments.

1897. NEWBURY.—The Memorial to Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, who fell in the Battle of Newbury. Placed under the guardianship of the Trust by the Newbury Field Club.

1900. RUSKIN MONUMENT.—On Friars Crag, Derwentwater. Erected by subscription, and handed over to the Trust for protection.

1901. SHAROW CROSS.—The remains of an old Sanctuary Cross near Ripon, with a small plot of land surrounding it, given to the Trust by W. Garnett, Esq., and C. J. Garnett, Esq.

The purpose of the Trust is stated in the following extract from the first report:—

The governing object of the Trust, as set forth in the Memorandum of Association,* is "To promote the permanent preservation, for the benefit of the nation, of lands and tenements (including buildings) of beauty or historic interest; and as regards lands, to preserve (as far as practicable) their natural aspect, features, and animal and plant life; and for this purpose to accept, from private owners of property, gifts of places of interest or beauty, and to hold the lands, houses, and other property thus acquired, in trust for the use and enjoyment of the nation." No lands or tenements of beauty or historic interest, given or bequeathed to or acquired by the Trust for the benefit of the nation, "shall," the Memorandum of Association declares, "at any time, whether upon the winding up or dissolution of the Trust or otherwise, be sold or otherwise dealt with in a manner inconsistent with the objects of the Trust," thus the Association affords ample security for the permanent safe custody of all property committed to its care.

Members of the Trust are subscribers

* The Memorandum and Articles of Association may be inspected at the Registered Office of the Trust, No. 1, Great College-street, Westminster, or copies may be obtained on payment of a sum of 1s.

of 10s. and upwards annually. Annual subscriptions may be commuted by the payment of £20; and those who, for any reason, wish to aid the work of the Trust without becoming members, may do so by means of donations, annual or otherwise, however small.

It should be clearly understood that the Trust is forbidden, by its Memorandum and Articles of Association, to divide any profits that may be made among its members.

A PASSAGE FROM MARTINEAU.

Sir,—The quotation you seek to verify occurs in Dr. Martineau's sermon on "Mammon Worship" in the "Endeavours after the Christian Life." The passage in its entirety is as follows:—

The mere lapse of years is not life: to eat and drink and sleep; to be exposed to the darkness and the light; to pace round the mill of habit and turn the wheel of wealth; to make reason our book-keeper, and turn thought into an implement of trade—this is not life. In all this, but a poor fraction of the consciousness of humanity is awakened; and the sanctities still slumber which make it worth while to be. Knowledge, truth, love, beauty, goodness, faith, alone give vitality to the mechanism of existence, &c. (P. 110 in the first edition; page 78 in the fourth.)

It is interesting to note the changes of style in Martineau's writings from time to time. The varieties are all excellent in their kind. His contributions to the Liverpool Controversy in 1839 offered splendid examples of argumentative rhetoric—for example, the concluding passage of Lecture XII. In the "Endeavours," 1843 and 1847, the style is changed. There is less rhetorical excellence, but a sacred and exalted eloquence befitting the themes as in the noble sermon on the "Communion of Saints." In the "Types of Ethical Theory," the style is again changed as befits the argument; and the two ample volumes are of unique excellence, in the sustained flow of clear and attractive sentences throughout the close argument—a merit, I venture to say, peculiar to Martineau, and in which no ethical writer before or since his time comes within measurable distance of him.

The "Hours of Thought" are hours of thought indeed, and afford but little scope for eloquence, and old age with almost all men restrains the most eloquent tongue; but it was not thus with Martineau. "An old man standing on the verge," in the wonderfully beautiful address to his former pupils called "Loss and Gain in Theology" he never evinced more the faculty of perfect, harmonious, tender, pathetic utterance. The listeners must have felt as did Adam when

The angel ended and in Adam's ear
So charming left his voice that he awhile Thought him still speaking, still stood fixed to hear.

MARTINEAU AND UNITARIANISM.

Sir,—Will you permit me to take up the challenge you hold out to me in your issue for Aug. 10?

Several months ago I stated in your columns that Martineau was neither a fetish nor an infallible oracle and to that position I adhere absolutely. By all means, then, let us substitute "representative teacher" for "authoritative," which latter epithet I employed simply as meaning that Martineau is generally understood by us as speaking "with authority" on matters of religion.

How does the position stand then? Martineau, as my article in the August Seed Sower once more shows, held with great consistency certain views of the nature and function of Christ. If, as a matter of fact, our views, or the views of many of us, on such ultimata of Religion are quite different—if these quite different views are "a fulfilled achievement of Unitarian thought"—how is Martineau any longer our "representative" teacher? Or in what sense can we be "followers" of his, except in the sense in which Mr. Asquith is a "follower" of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman?

I beg to submit that this is not a question of imposing doctrinal tests; it is a question of facing facts and abiding by their verdict. J. Warschauer.

A WORD OF EXPLANATION.

Sir,—Mr. Upton's criticism of an article of mine in the July number of Mind recalls an observation made by the late Professor Sidgwick:—"The chief service which the philosopher renders to the 'plain man' is to protect him from other philosophers."

Mr. Upton describes the article as "striking"; but this verdict can scarcely be deserved by the paper as a whole. It must rather be deserved by the few sentences which he selects for such severe criticism. Evidently these sentences were so striking as to monopolise the whole of Mr. Upton's attention, and make it impossible for him to notice either the context of the passages which he quotes, or the general drift of the whole article to which they belong. Mr. Upton went forth to find a "soft" determinist, who denied the existence of the soul; and accordingly he found him, and belaboured him with a will.

The only possible reply would be to say over again most of what was said in that paper; but such a waste of space is hardly necessary.

It may have been a mistake to refer to the question of Free Will at all in the article; I did so because I was testing and defending a principle which seemed to save the ordinary doctrine of Free Will from those objections on account of which almost all psychologists, moralists, and philosophers have rejected it. On the other hand, I am still guilty of refusing to regard the doctrine of Free Will as an infallible dogma, maintained by a small body of "the elect," and never to be questioned. I believe that it is a very inadequate account of what takes place in an act of choice; and I cannot think that religion and morality are so feeble as to stand or fall with this doctrine. My experience of the practical work of the ministry has only strengthened this view.

One sentence quoted by Mr. Upton contains a slip of the pen for which he is not responsible. I should have said, "Upon the fact of Moral Responsibility all but materialists are agreed." A human being who is sound in body and mind is morally accountable for his actions—accountable to himself, to society, and to the Almighty. More than this is not required by Religion, Morality, or the Common Sense of the race at large. S. H. Mellone.

REMEMBER THE BRETHREN.

Sir,—At the present season, when some of our friends are taking the advantage of holidays, and rest so much needed is enjoyed, our country congregations suffer very much in consequence. In one place the chapel is closed, in another the Sunday-school is left in the hands of a few to whom the work is trying, in others a scanty attendance only is seen. Now, some of this may be obviated if those of our fellow-worshippers who are within easy distance of one of our chapels would pay a visit to them. I think it should be borne in mind that many attend who are quite unable to afford holidays, and that they should be left alone when fellow-worshippers are in their immediate neighbourhood is discouraging. A visit from fellow-believers and workers would at all times cheer and encourage the faithful few. T. Bond.

DR. MARTINEAU'S TEACHING CONCERNING JESUS.

A LARGE number of Unitarians regard themselves as disciples of Dr. Martineau. They believe they owe to him, more than to any other man, the conception of Christianity which we may call Theocentric as distinguished from that which is Christocentric. But these Unitarians have been accused of forsaking the teaching of Martineau when, as a consequence of this belief in the possibility of a direct knowledge of God, through reason and conscience, they have come to hold that Jesus ceases to be an object of religion and takes only his natural place at the head of Christian history as a spiritual teacher and leader of Christians. This seems to be a necessary and logical consequence to Christian Theists, as distinguished from the position of those who assign to Christ a place in the God-head.

Some critics of this view, who reject the creeds of the Church, and do not even appeal to the authority of Paul or John, who are themselves Unitarian, not only assert that a much higher place than that which is implied in the terms teacher and leader is due to Jesus, but that in some sense Jesus himself is the Gospel and therefore the object, and not only the teacher and pattern, of religion. They claim that for this opinion they have the authority of Martineau, and that Christian Theists are mistaken in supposing that they are his followers. One or two quotations from sermons by Dr. Martineau are put forward in proof of the correctness of this assertion, and these are held to be decisive by the writers who rely upon them.

Dr. Martineau so frequently and so frankly spoke of Jesus that it ought not to be difficult to find out what he really thought and meant, and to discover which divergent set of opinions is most in harmony with his. Upon examination it is clear that very different opinions are attributed to Martineau, and a very difficult problem might be supposed to confront us, if it were not for a very simple explanation; the explanation being that Dr. Martineau did not hold the same opinions throughout his long and fruitful life. There was no inconsistency in this any more than there is in the case of other men who abandon the opinions of their youth as they come to maturer years, and who even then do not cease to inquire, but continuously as they attain to more wisdom conform their thought to their increasing knowledge. That this was so in the case of Martineau is known to every one who is acquainted with his life and writings. The Rev. Edwin Odgers, in the important paper on this subject which he read at Essex Hall in 1900, traced to a considerable extent the features of Martineau's theological development, though unfortunately on that occasion time did not permit Mr. Odgers to complete his survey, and the later stages of that development were only briefly dealt with. That Dr. Martineau recognised and admitted this development himself ought to be remembered; we are not inventing a theory in order to explain away some part of his teaching with which we may not agree. In the Memorial Preface to the volume of Mr. Thom's sermons, "A Spiritual Faith," Dr. Martineau says:—

> The living teacher has only to tell the truth possessing him here and now; and should it afterwards cease to possess him, being replaced by something truer, he will not repeat, but amend it; he will cast his blunders into the dark behind him, and follow the track of light alone.—A Spiritual Faith, p. v.

And in the Preface to "The Seat of Authority" he explicitly says he had found it necessary to readjust some of his judgments as a consequence of a study of the works of the more recent critics of the New Testament.

There is good reason to believe that this theological development of Martineau is sometimes overlooked, and he is represented as the advocate of opinions which he had deliberately abandoned. In any reference, then, to his opinions it is desirable to observe to what stage in his development they belonged; to quote a passage at random from his works, as conclusive evidence of his opinion upon any given subject, without reference to its period, or any possible subsequent modification of it, may be misleading and do an injustice to Dr. Martineau himself. It is necessary, therefore, to bear in mind that Dr. Martineau did from time to time readjust his judgments; and his earlier opinions must not be repeated without due regard being paid to his later ones.

A letter which recently appeared in THE INQUIRER afforded a curious and striking illustration of the neglect of this very obvious duty. The writer quoted several passages from Martineau written at different periods of his life, yet did not notice that they represented different views or that one was intended to correct another. The first quotation given was from his Ordination Address, and one of the last was from "The Seat of Authority," being thus separated from one another by about sixty years, during which period the theology of Martineau had undergone important changes.

The quotation from the Ordination Address was as follows:—

> I receive and reverence Christ not merely for his sinless excellence, which renders him a perfect pattern to our race, but as the commissioned delegate of heaven, as the chosen representative of the Most High.—INQUIRER, April 27, p. 266.

This we might call the early Unitarian view (as distinguished from the Arian—a different kind of Unitarian) in which Jesus was regarded as a purely human being, but none the less as having a commission from God—as an ambassador who represented a higher power. An interesting reminiscence of Dr. Martineau's reminds us of the importance of the distinction in those days; the people amongst whom he settled in Ireland (1828-1832) were Arians.

> And so resolute (he says) was the aversion to any further step that on letting fall an expression implying the simple humanity of Christ, I had lost in Dublin the most attached friend I had among my hearers.—A Spiritual Faith, Preface, p. viii.

In the sermon on "Christ the Divine Word" ("Hours of Thought," Vol. II.) Dr. Martineau does not repeat the opinion expressed in his Ordination Address, but emphatically replaces it by what he had come to consider a truer one:—

> If, in Christ, this divine margin was not simply broader than elsewhere, but spread till it covered the whole soul, and brought the human into moral coalescence with the Divine, then not was God merely represented by a foreign and resembling being, but personally there, giving expression to His spiritual nature, as in the visible universe to His causal power.

This is a distinct departure from his earlier view, and it would be illogical to quote them both as if there were no difference between them.

This passage from the sermon on "Christ the Divine Word" has been much quoted of late, but the mere quotation without any qualifying criticism is again likely to be misleading. The impossibility of fixing the date when this sermon was written is an obvious disadvantage, but it evidently belongs to what we may call the middle period of Martineau's theology, yet still comparatively early in his career; but our judgment in this matter must be affected by our interpretation of the sermon itself. In the preface to Mr. Thom's sermons already quoted, Martineau admits that even as early as 1839 he had left the point of view of the Fourth Gospel—he could not refer the Johannine discourses to the speaker of the Sermon on the Mount—and even that he and Mr. Thom were not on the same level with regard to their views of the historical authenticity of the Synoptic reports.

> Hence, I could not (he says), without some qualification, adopt my friend's conception of the historic Christ as the absolute measure of what, in the Divine idea, Man is meant to be; exhibiting the very goal of manhood in its final glory. This overstatement, if such it be, was probably an unconscious survival of his superhuman pre-existent Christ.—A Spiritual Faith, Preface, p. xiv.

This seems to indicate that even as early as 1839 Martineau was leaving behind him the Johannine influence which appears to permeate the sermon on "Christ the Divine Word"; unless that sermon itself is an "unconscious survival" of a previous stage of thought. How entirely he subsequently freed himself from that influence may be gathered from the sections on The Fourth Gospel and The Logos in "The Seat of Authority."

The passage on the personal presence of God in Christ has been quoted as though it were a complete, final, and dogmatic expression of Dr. Martineau's Christology; and even if it is contended that though he did not intend it as a dogma, yet it expressed a belief which he never changed, even if this could be admitted, the force of the passage is considerably modified by a later utterance. I again refer to the preface to Mr. Thom's sermons, and this preface has the importance of being one of Martineau's latest writings. He says, apparently quoting in part from Mr. Thom:—

> God is His own revealer, in so far as "He is ever presenting Himself in personal acts to the souls of men," so that "conscience will not suffer us to doubt that He is there in person," and that "He holds direct intercourse with us through reason and conscience."

This, it appears to me, immensely affects the force of the statement that God was personally there in the soul of Christ—it is no longer a solitary exception, but one case out of an unknown number. Wherever God holds direct intercourse with men, through their reason and conscience, He is there personally. Nothing is predicated of Jesus but what may, with equal truth, be predicated of other men. Whether Dr. Martineau had his earlier utterance in mind, and intended this later one to be an amendment of it or not, it is impossible to say; but it has the effect of rendering the inference that has been drawn from it no longer tenable.

In "The Seat of Authority," Dr. Martineau's most mature work, dealing with the relation of Jesus to God and to mankind, we find him not only subjecting the New Testament writings to the most exhaustive criticism, but also exhibiting marked restraint in his expressions regarding Jesus himself. I do not think there is any allusion, or reference to, or description of, Jesus, or of his relation to us, in the whole volume, which is not covered by the view of him as simply a great religious teacher and leader; a teacher and example, but especially a teacher by example, which constitutes him a leader.

The conclusion of the whole matter is summed up in the beautiful closing sentences:—

> For in the very constitution of the human soul there is provision for an immediate apprehension of God. But often in the transient lights and shades of conscience we pass on and "know not who it is": and not till we see in another the victory that shames our own defeats, and are caught up by an enthusiasm for some realised heroism or sanctity, do the authority of right and the beauty of holiness come home to us as an appeal literally divine. The train of the conspicuously righteous in their several degrees are for us the real angels that pass to and fro on the ladder that reaches from earth to heaven. And if Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion with God—p. 651-2.

Whether this was intended as an amendment of any of Dr. Martineau's earlier views or not is immaterial; it is a complete justification, as far as his opinion is concerned, of those who regard Jesus as simply a great religious teacher and leader—indeed, the greatest of all, as Christians believe.

Jesus is no longer the "Divine Word," he is the "Prince of Saints"—a purely human and unambiguous title, avoiding all metaphysical and theological implications; not separated from his fellow-men, but their natural leader by reason of his greater success; not a solitary personality standing aloof in lofty isolation from all mankind, but one of a class, even though the head of it. Not the revealer of God, but the revealer, by his own achievement, of the highest possibilities of the human soul; attaining this position, not by virtue of a higher nature, but by dependence on habitual communion with God.

This is not to deny, but to confess, that Jesus is an encouragement and an inspiration to those who contemplate his life or receive his teaching; but the encouragement and inspiration are only possible upon the conviction that Jesus was in all respects a man like ourselves.

No man can reveal God to us, nor is it necessary he should, if, as Dr. Martineau taught, we are capable of receiving direct revelation from God Himself:—

> The Divine seer does not convey over to you his revelation, but qualifies you to receive your own.

If the view of Jesus set forth in "The Seat of Authority" appears to detract from his greatness (which in reality it does not), it has the advantage of raising our estimate of the capacity of the human soul, and bringing us into closer and direct relations with God Himself; the consciousness of God leaves no place for the intervention of another.

If Revealed Religion is an immediate Divine knowledge, it is strictly personal and individual; and must be born anew in every mind. It admits of no condition separating the Self Revealer from the recipient soul, it is a light for which the two alone are needful, alone are possible. The secret of God is with the "pure in heart" taken one by one.—The Seat of Authority, p. 307.

THE MUSLIM ROSARY.

[The disciples of Islam, like the followers of Buddha and the members of various Christian churches, sometimes use the rosary in their devotions. With the Muslims it serves as a register in meditation on the titles of the Deity. The recital of the "Ninety-nine Wonderful Names of God" is a favourite exercise of Mohammedan piety. In the following metrical version the names are printed in capitals.]

"God is God," the Muslim says. "His names
Are nine and ninety; wonderful are they.
Count them upon the string of beads. He is
The KING who reigns o'er all the Universe.
The HOLY is God's name through every age,
The PEACEFUL and the FAITHFUL. He alone
Is the PROTECTOR of the souls of men.
He is the DEAR ONE—dearer none can be.
Alone is He REPAIRER of all waste.
God is GREAT, yea than all greatness, great.
CREATOR He of every thing that is,
The MAKER and the FASHIONER of all.
FORGIVER He, who is the DOMINANT.
BESTOWER He; PROVIDER of all things.
He is the OPENER from whom no thing
Is hid. The KNOWER too is He.
Who all things curbs, He the RESTRAINER is.
He is also the SPREADER, and He is
The KEEPER OF ALL SECRETS; praise His name.
He is the EXALTER and the HONOURER.
He is the DESTROYER of all evil things.
He is the HEARER and He is the SEER.
The RULER He, the JUST and BEAUTIFUL.
No thing is hid, He is of all AWARE.
God is God, and CLEMENT unto us.
He is the GRAND, and the FORGIVING He.
The GRATEFUL, the EXALTED, and the GREAT.
The GUARDIAN and the STRENGTHENER of souls.
God is the RECKONER—who all things will count.
MAJESTIC is He. God is GENEROUS.
He is the WATCHER and the APPROVER He.
God is God: the COMPREHENDER He,
The WISE, the LOVING, the MAGNIFICENT.
He is the RAISER of the fallen. He
Of all things is the WITNESS. He Alone is TRUTH, and He is ADVOCATE.
The STRONG, the FIRM, the PATRON He.
God is God; He is the LAUDABLE.
The COUNTER of all living things is He.
God is the BEGINNER and RESTORER too.
The QUICKENER and the KILLER—both is He.
He is the LIVING, the SUBSISTING, He.
The FINDER, yea the GLORIOUS is He.
God is God; He is the only ONE.
The EVERLASTING—blessed be His name.
God is the POWERFUL, the PREVAILING He.
The BRINGER FORWARD, the DEFERRER He.
He is the FIRST, the LAST, the EVIDENT;
He is also the HIDDEN; praise His name.
God is the GOVERNOR and the EXALTED He.
God is God; the RIGHTEOUS one is He.
ACCEPTER OF REPENTANCE is God's name.
God is the AVENGER and is PARDONER too.
The KIND is He—the kind for God is God,
The RULER OF THE KINGDOM too is God,
God is the LORD OF AWE AND GEN'ROUS GIFTS,
The EQUITABLE, the COLLECTOR is,
The INDEPENDENT, the ENRICHER is;
He is the GIVER, the WITHHOLDER He.
God who DISTRESSER is, is PROFITER.
He is the LIGHT, the GUIDE, INCOMPARABLE.
God is ENDURING, the INHERITOR.
DIRECTOR He of all things that exist.
God is the PATIENT, blessed be His name.
His names of excellence are ninety-nine.
Yea, God is God, and there is none but He."

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN YEAR BOOK.

This substantial volume, strongly bound in limp cloth, will prove of great interest to friends of Unitarianism in this country, as it must be indispensable to all workers in the Unitarian Churches of America. Edited by the Rev. F. B. Mott, the book is dated for July 1, and this date of issue, instead of New Year's Day as hitherto, is to be maintained in future as the best time, after the annual meetings of various societies, and the end of the season's work, for furnishing complete and accurate information for the next twelve months.

Writing of the "Year Book" in the Christian Register, Dr. Samuel A. Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, gives the following particulars of its contents:—

"The list of churches contains the name of 458 organised churches, of which 11 were organised during the year ending July 1; 375 of these 458 report the number of families connected with the church; and the total reaches 35,200 families, so that we are justified in assuming that between 35,000 and 40,000 American families are reasonably to be counted upon as supporters of the Unitarian cause, in direct connection with Unitarian churches. The number of ministers recorded is 554. Fifteen ministers have died during the past year, and admirable brief notices of their careers have been prepared by the Rev. Henry F. Jenks, necrologist for the Association. Four other names have been dropped, and twenty-three new names have been added.

"The price of the 'Year Book' is fifty cents a copy; and it can be obtained by addressing the American Unitarian Association, 25, Beacon-street, Boston. It is sent free to life members of the Association, to delegates of the churches entitled to representation at the last annual meeting, and to all ministers settled in Unitarian parishes. This gratuitous distribution amounts to 2,586 copies.

"The book contains a short history of the Unitarian movement; accounts of the international and national organisations of our fellowship; the list of names and addresses of ministers; the list of churches, together with much useful information about their administration, property, hours of service, constituency, &c.; lists of conferences, alliances, clubs, young people's societies, ministerial associations, educational and benevolent organisations with their officers; the necrology of the past year; and the usual information about Unitarian books, tracts, and periodicals. The book is carefully indexed, and is illustrated by half-tone pictures of fifteen churches, mostly newly built, and by six folded maps showing the geographical distribution of Unitarian churches in the United States, in New England, in Massachusetts, in Great Britain and Ireland, in Hungary, in Transylvania."

We note that while the "Year Book" contains a memorial notice of the late Charles Carroll Everett, who died in October, 1900, in the account of Harvard Divinity School his name is still left as Dean and Professor of Theology.

In the condensed summary of Unitarian history, the B. and F.U.A. is said to have been founded on the same day as the A.U.A.; but, as a matter of fact, it was on the following day, and on p. 9 the date is correctly given as May 26, 1825.

To say that the Dissenters' Chapels Act of 1844 "restored full civil privileges to Unitarians" in England hardly describes what was effected by the Act, which was passed to meet one special need, to secure Unitarians in the possession of their old meeting-houses, which in a continuous line of religious life they had inherited, unpledged to any particular form of doctrine. On p. 2 the word "Religious" is omitted from the title of the International Council.

On p. 5 it should be 1774, not 1778, for the date of the founding of Lindsey's Unitarian Church, if by that is meant the living church or congregation.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Barnard Castle.—The preacher last Sunday was Mr. Thomas Paxton, of South Shields, who took for the subject of his evening sermon, "Christ's Gospel the Need of the World." There was a very good congregation, the little chapel being nearly filled.

Guildford.—Recently special addresses have been delivered in Ward-street Church by Mr. Alderman Edwin Ellis, J.P., Mr. Philip Tovey, Mr. Edward A. Martin, F.G.S., Mr. Philip Vizard, and Mr. Frederick W. Lambelle. Before the last quarterly congregational meeting, the preceding evening service was conducted by Mr. Edwin Ellis, who preached a most searching and cogent discourse upon the present theological controversy relative to the Religion of the Incarnation. The subsequent meeting resolved itself into a very interesting discussion, which was entirely the result of this inspiring address. The speakers, Mr. Philip Vizard, Mr. Alfred J. Roberton, Mr. Howell, and Mr. Downes, were all agreed, though viewing affairs from very varied standpoints. Mr. Ellis's sermon was a crusade against Christolatry.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday, the 4th inst., the 190th anniversary of the General Baptist congregation, founded by Robert Cosens, chief steward of the Royal Palace at Audley End, was commemorated; when sermons were preached by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, morning and evening; collections were in advance of recent years. On Tuesday, the 6th inst., the annual outing of school and friends was held, when upwards of sixty persons in brakes went, by the kind invitation of Sir Walter Gilbey, Bart., to Elsenham Hall, where the Riding School had been arranged for their accommodation, and the grounds thrown open for their amusements.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Sunday, August 11, a Flower Service of Song was rendered by the teachers and scholars in the school-room, and an address was delivered to the scholars by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Wigan.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A PARTY of about thirty travellers, under the leadership of Miss Tagart, President of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, left Holborn Viaduct Station early on Friday morning on a visit to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary. The party is due at Budapest next Thursday, and at Kolozsvár on Monday week, where preparations are being made for the opening of the new college buildings. There is a special interest in this journey being made under Miss Tagart's guidance, as it was her father, the late Rev. Edward Tagart, at that time minister of Little Portland-street Chapel, and secretary of the B. and F.U.A., who in 1858, accompanied by his daughter, made the first visit of sympathy to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary, on behalf of English Unitarians. Mr. Tagart unhappily contracted a fatal illness on the journey, and on his way home died at Brussels, Oct. 12, 1858, being only fifty-four years of age. In the following year the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who was then Domestic Missionary in Liverpool, also visited Transylvania on behalf of the Association, and from that time close intercourse between the churches of the two countries has been unbroken, and has grown more and more intimate through the presence of successive Hungarian students at Manchester College.

IN 1868 the late Rev. John James Tayler, Principal of Manchester New College, paid a visit to Transylvania, to be present at the three hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Unitarin Church, with the first proclamation of religious liberty at Torda in 1568—a visit which he described in the Theological Review of January, 1869. Ten years later, in August, 1879, the Rev. Alexander Gordon represented the Unitarians of England and Ireland on occasion of the Tercentennial Commemoration of Francis David, the Rev. Andrew Chalmers being also present. Mr. Gordon's valuable report was published by the Association, and Mr. Chalmers's "Transylvania Recollections" are also to be had. The next official visitor was the late Rev. Henry Ierson, Secretary of the B. and F.U.A., who in 1890 attended the opening of the new church, in Budapest, with Miss Tagart and Miss Florence Hill. And, lastly, in 1896, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson went over in connection with the Millenial Festival of the Hungarian nation.

"THROUGH Truth to Freedom, and through Them to Inward Peace" is the motto chosen by Dr. C. Schieler for his pamphlet "Mein Austritt aus der Katholischen Kirche," a second and enlarged edition of which was published last February at Frankfurt, and may be had for 90 pf. from the "Neuer Frankfurter Verlag." We publish this week Dr. Schieler's paper on "The Free Religious Communities of Germany," read to the International Council in Whit-week, and we should be glad to think that many of our readers have turned to the fuller exposition, and the most interesting personal record of this pamphlet. Dr. Schieler, as an earnest Roman Catholic priest, was first led to question the doctrine he had accepted by the contrast between the high doctrine of the Sacrament and the bearing of priests in celebrating mass, and the attitude of Catholics generally towards the services of the Church. He tells of a priest who long ago said to him after an Easter celebration, "Such an Easter must make a conscientious priest either insane or indifferent"; but for himself he found there was a third alternative, and that was to recognise that the position was intolerable and contrary to the truth of Christ's Gospel. Therefore he came out from the Church into spiritual freedom. Dr. Schieler worked for some time among Evangelical Protestants in America, and attended the Chicago Parliament of Religions in 1893. Latterly, as he has told us, he has been minister of the Free Religious Community at Königsberg.

DR. H. C. G. MOULE, since 1899, Norrisian Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, has been appointed Bishop of Durham, in succession to the late Dr. Westcott, who in his turn succeeded Bishop Lightfoot. Thus the line of distinguished New Testament scholars passing from Cambridge to Durham is continued, and enlightened Evangelicals will be glad to have so capable a representative on the episcopal bench. Dr. Moule, who was born in 1841, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was for many years a Fellow of his College. He was the first Principal of Ridley Hall at Cambridge, from 1881 to 1899, and is the author of scholarly commentaries on the Epistles in the "Cambridge" and the "Expositor's Bible."

THE Melbourne Argus of July 5 reports an address by Professor Iverach, of the United Free Church College, Aberdeen, on "The New Testament and Criticism," to the members of the Presbyterian Fellowship Union and others. The lecturer, referring to the progress of criticism during the last eighty years, since the time of Strauss and Baur, quoted the testimony of Harnack to the effect that, with the possible exceptions of two of the smaller epistles, the books of the New Testament belong to the first century. Controversy at present was chiefly engaged with the Gospels. And if the report is correct, he went on to affirm that "the fourth Gospel is now better authenticated than the first three, and has been brought so near the lifetime of John that it cannot have been written by anyone else." As Dr. Iverach quoted Harnack as an authority on New Testament chronology, it is a pity that he did not allow more weight to his opinion on more fundamental questions. He might then have quoted the following passage from Harnack's lectures on "What is Christianity?"

> Our authorities for the message which Jesus Christ delivered are—apart from certain important statements made by Paul—the first three Gospels. Everything that we know, independently of these Gospels, about Jesus' history and his teaching, may be easily put on a small sheet of paper, so little does it come to. In particular, the fourth Gospel, which does not emanate or profess to emanate from the Apostle John, cannot be taken as an historical authority in the ordinary meaning of the word. The author of it acted with sovereign freedom, transposed events and put them in a strange light, drew up the discourses himself, and illustrated great thoughts by imaginary situations.

LAST Saturday's Athenæum, in a review of M. H. Omont's "Notice sur un très ancien Manuscrit grec de l'Evangile de S. Matthieu en Onciales d'Or," described one more added to the number of gorgeous New Testament manuscripts, written in golden letters on purple vellum. This manuscript, which is now at Paris in the National Library, was brought from Sinope, in Asia Minor, two years ago, by a French Artillery officer. M. Omont has now published the whole text, with photographs of four of the five miniatures, representing scenes from the gospel story, with which it is illustrated. The manuscript consists of forty-three leaves, and s said to contain not quite a third of the gospel of St. Matthew, the chief section being from chapter xiii. to xxiv. It belongs to a well-known class of MSS., the "Syrian" group, and is assigned to the sixth century. It does not appear to add anything of consequence to our knowledge of the text, as the chief part of it is already well known in the almost identical "Codex Petropolitanus."

Writing in Wednesday's Daily News in answer to the question "Is the world growing better or worse?" Canon Barnett gave the following expression to his wholesome faith:—

Your question has set me thinking, and at last I have come down on the side of optimism. Two years ago I should have had no hesitation, but the war has destroyed many of the landmarks by which I used to judge, and left me doubtful of many hopes which I used to cherish. It is hard to be an optimist in the presence of conditions such as those which "A Pessimist" describes, but it seems to me he takes for signs of death what may be signs of life. The signs are like and are easily mistaken. The distinction, I suppose, is that where there is an advance in the love of truth and in the love of man there is life, and where there is content with falsehood and satisfaction in selfishness there is death. Now, Sir, I think in the instances offered as signs that the world is growing worse may be found evidence both of a greater desire for truth and of a larger love of man. Your correspondent points truly enough to the decay of church-going and the materialism of sermons, but is not this to a large extent the result of a demand for more reality—is not the refusal of so many men to take orders a proof that they put honesty before favour or profit? Are there not, on many sides, demands for a religion which shall unite men with all they know to be highest and with their fellow-men? Is there not a vague idealism floating above material cries? Is there not everywhere a movement towards unity, towards federation?

And while in the fields of industry and commerce Canon Barnett admits that bribery, adulteration, and swindling are all too common, there are other much more hopeful signs of the times. While evil elements loom large and seem to fill the stage, the men who are really the most influential are of a very different kind:—

It is forgotten that the more important players are honourable, devoted, and high-minded. A moment's observation will reveal the fact that the leading firms depend on traditions of honour, that their individual members put up higher and higher standards of conduct, that there is a wider benevolence than in any generation, that the trades unions steadily press towards securing good work and good order as well as the security of their members, that, although the evil looms large, the general trend is towards better work, that is, a greater love of truth, and towards more human methods of labour, that is, a greater love of men.

The Indian Messenger of July 21 gives a cordial welcome to the Indian Ladies' Magazine. Many of our readers will be glad to see from the following note the high ideal with which the new magazine enters on its career, which, we trust, will be very fruitful of good:—

It is not long since we had the pleasure of congratulating Mrs. Sathianadhan on her obtaining the degree of M.A., the first that was given to a lady by the University of Madras. To-day we congratulate her as heartily on the publication of the Indian Ladies' Magazine under her editorship. The new magazine promises, from its first number, to be an interesting and useful journal. Its main object will be "to help to advance the cause of the women of India." The introduction further says:—"In the pages of this magazine the social and other evils which the daughters of India have been labouring under for centuries past will be dealt with, and their claims for better education and for greater freedom to develop all that is best in their character will be strenuously advocated. The subjects of education and social reform will, of course, receive the most prominent attention in these columns. The advance that is being actually made by the women of India in education, in social and moral reform, and other lines of progress will be from time to time recorded, and the Indian ideals of womanhood, as represented in the ancient literature, will receive every attention.

We have already recorded the experience of the Rev. Lucking Tavener at Ipswich in connection with an "unsectarian" Social Settlement, in which he was debarred from "Brotherhood" membership on the ground that a Unitarian is not a Christian. Mr. Tavener very rightly used that occasion to preach a special sermon "In Defence of Unitarianism," and this has been published by his congregation, and may be had of the secretary, or at Essex Hall, for twopence. The sermon contains a plain statement of what Unitarianism is, as "that form of Christianity which holds to the primitive faith in the Simple Unity of God—that God is one, and not a Trinity; that Jesus Christ is the greatest and holiest of God's teachers; but not God—the best of all sons of the Divine Father, but not the same as the Father." It proceeds to treat of Unitarianism "from a Biblical standpoint," and then touches on the Inspiration of the Bible, and the Deification of Jesus; after a brief sketch of the story of Unitarianism, it concludes as follows:—

We claim that our doctrines give a breadth wide enough to include all seekers after truth; a hope high and bright enough to give cheer to all in religious doubt; and we believe it is the faith of the Great Founder of Christianity and a reasonable basis of all future unity in church life and thought.

The National Conference Guilds' Union has issued a "Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Meetings" (to be had for 3d. from Messrs. Wilkinson and Lister, St. James'-street, Sheffield, or from the Rev. John Ellis, Pisgah House, Broomhill, Sheffield; 3½d. by post). The motto of the Union is "For God and the Good Life," and its object "To unite the Young People, and all workers and helpers of our Congregations and Sunday-schools, in a League of Fellowship, to foster the Religious Life and inspire Personal Service." The manual contains five Guild services, with the headings, "Spiritual Worship," "Consecration," "Thanksgiving," "Aspiration and Endeavour," and "Disciples of Jesus." There is also a form for the reception of members, a morning and evening prayer, additional prayers, and some final words of counsel "on the due observance of Public Worship." Two blank pages at the end might well have been used to avoid the rather awkward arrangement of the matter which runs on from page to page, with titles sometimes quite at the bottom; but the little manual, except for this, is very well got up, and will, we think, receive the welcome it deserves.

A VILLAGE CHAPEL.

Wiltshire does not appear to be a fertile soil for liberal Christianity, for according to the "Essex Hall Year Book" we have only two congregations in the whole county. One of these is the well-known Conigre Chapel at Trowbridge, for many years associated with good old Samuel Martin, one of the patriarchs of the General Baptist Assembly. But how many are there among the readers of The Inquirer who have ever heard of Rushall? It is a tiny village on the edge of the Wiltshire Downs, three miles from the nearest railway station; its population is given in the Directory as 188; the list of Parliamentary voters contains only thirty names—it is surely the last place in the world where one would look for any form of liberal thought. Yet here is an old General Baptist chapel, founded in 1706, which is the only Nonconformist place of worship in the parish.

If I can help it, I never miss an opportunity of visiting our churches, so, spending a holiday in Savernake Forest, after worshipping on Sunday morning in the nearest Anglican church, I found that it was only a ten miles' cycle ride to Rushall, and was therefore tempted to rush all the way there and back on my iron steed. It is a quaint, old-fashioned chapel, with high pews of plain unvarnished deal; there is no organ or harmonium, the singing being accompanied by a cornet, two violins, and a violoncello. The preacher, Mr. Keates, is an earnest and zealous layman, who for the last ten years has come over from Trowbridge every Sunday to take the services. By the exigencies of the train service he is obliged to leave home before six o'clock in the morning, and to walk three or four miles each way in all weathers, conducting a Sunday-school in the morning, and services at 2.30 and 5.30.

He is content to leave doctrinal questions alone, and to preach a simple New Testament Christianity, which is better suited to a village congregation. The attendance in the afternoon was very small, but upwards of twenty persons were present in the evening. This may seem but a handful, but, compared with the population of the village, how many of our town churches can show as good a proportion? It is only equalled by some of our country congregations in the north of Ireland. One of our ministers, who removed to Ireland from a large manufacturing town in Lancashire, told me that his English friends asked him what was the population of the place to which he was going? how many thousand inhabitants?

As a matter of fact, it was merely a hamlet, consisting of the meeting-house, the manse, the school-room, and one or two cottages. Yet a congregation of about a hundred assembled there every Sunday, many of them coming several miles. But while there are towns in England of 100,000 inhabitants, where we are utterly unrepresented, it does seem strange to find one of our chapels in a purely agricultural village. I was much pleased with my visit to Rushall, and felt that a word of sympathy and encouragement was due to Mr. Keates for his praiseworthy efforts in keeping open one of the outposts of our faith.

UNPOPULARITY.

Beneath the shadow of the cross they rest,
They who forsake the world's too easy way,
For they have seen the breaking of the day,
And though by thoughtless multitudes oppressed,
They follow with the saints and heroes, scorned
By their own era, persecuted, bound,
Reviled and hated, and with thorn-wreaths crowned,
But by the next with haloes bright adorned.
They tread the upward path the martyrs trod,
And, better far than all earth's kind caressing,
There rests upon their hearts and lives, in blessing,
A light divine, the perfect peace of God.
They win the purest gold; they lose but dross.
Their rest is sweet beneath the shadow of the cross.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES OF GERMANY.

BY DR. C. SCHIELER, KOENIGSBERG, PRUSSIA.*

It is a great honour and pleasure for me to be allowed to speak in this illustrious meeting of representatives from many countries of the world as a delegate of the Free Religious Community at Koenigsberg in Prussia, and to explain what the Free Religious Communities of Germany are, what their aim is, and how they are treated by the dominant Churches and the State.

But first it will be best to tell you that I have belonged to the Free Religious Movement only for five years. Before that time I was a professor of theology at an Episcopal College in Germany; but vexed by doubts about the Catholic doctrines, and tired of the spiritual tyranny and constraints of conscience, I left the Catholic Church with its destructive ultramontanism, and turned to the free and true Gospel of Jesus Christ. Now I know what liberty of inquiry is in religious questions, and acknowledge that true religion can prosper only on the basis of religious liberty. Now I know by experience the full meaning of the word of our great Master, Jesus Christ: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." At present I am working as a preacher for two Free Religious Communities, at Koenigsberg and Tilsit, and have had many opportunities of meeting people who are striving most earnestly for religious knowledge and moral perfection, who are leading a moral and religious life such as formerly I seldom found.

The Free Religious Community at Koenigsberg, the city of Kant the great philosopher, was the first of all the Free Religious Communities in Germany. The father and author of that movement in the Evangelical Church of Germany (Evangelische Landeskirche), which is a State Church (Staatskirche), was Dr. Julius Rupp, a man of an excellent philosophical and theological education and of great virtue, whose many publications are even yet, many years after his death, highly esteemed. Because he had preached in the Schlosskirche at Koenigsberg against the use of the old confessions of faith, especially of the Athanasian (Quicunque vult salvus esse ante omnia opus est ut teneat catholicam fidem), he was dismissed by a judgment of the Consistory; but his very numerous friends and scholars stood faithfully by the celebrated preacher and teacher, and founded a free religious community, which they named "Freie Evangelische Gemeinde." This was in the year 1846.

Soon afterwards free religious communities were founded in other cities of Germany: in Magdeburg by Uhlich, in Halle on the Salle by Wislisenus, in Nordhausen by Baltzer, &c. Two years later there was a similar movement in the Roman Catholic Church, a "Los von Rom-Bewegung" of that time, named Deutsch Katholische Bewegung, of which Ronge and Czerski were the leaders, with other Catholic priests who left the Church. The religious communities founded by these men were named Christkatholische or Apostolische or Deutsch Katholische Gemeinden, and were subsequently united with the free evangelical communities.

The history of our Free Religious Community is a history of persecution and sufferings, in part a history of Passion. The first preacher, Dr. Rupp, and the members of the community, were persecuted for many years by Church and State. Dr. Rupp was several times imprisoned because he was more obedient to his conscience than to the laws of the State; the religious services were watched by policemen and more than once dissolved; even private assemblies of members of the community in their houses were broken up by policemen. In the year 1851 the community was closed by the head of the police at Koenigsberg. After many troubles of various kinds the position of the community began to improve under the regency of the Prince of Prussia, afterwards Emperor William I. of Germany. Now the community is at liberty to celebrate its divine services and to keep its festivals, but in defiance of the Constitution. The members are not treated with impartiality by the officers of the State, and are despised and looked upon as heathens and infidels by officers of the Church against the words and example of Jesus Christ.

Our community aims at advancing the moral and religious life, on the ground of moral and religious liberty. We have no confessions of faith and do not prescribe any dogmas to our members. For free spontaneousness in all religious questions is the first and most important principle of our community. Everybody is expected and urged to further and to refine and to perfect his religious knowledge and to order his moral life according to his religious convictions. We are therefore Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers; we do not want to be free from religion; but we are free from any constraint in religious questions and in religious life, and want to have and to promote a good and true religion; therefore we do not believe that religion is morality only; morality is the best fruit of religion; but morality must always be joined with religion.

We esteem the Gospel highly, because it contains the doctrines of the greatest teacher of mankind, Jesus Christ; but we also respect the results of modern biblical inquiry and criticism. And we pay attention to the results of other sciences as they concern religion. We test them, and utilize them for the formation of our religious convictions; and we can do so, because we are free from dogmas and confessions of faith.

We are not members of a church; we have no pope, or bishop, or priest; we are a free association of liberal thinkers and workers like the first associations of Christians, established and governed by the Apostles in the earliest age of Christianity. Our aim is to erect the kingdom of God preached by Jesus Christ, the free kingdom of free children of God.

And I believe that such free religious communities have now a great importance, and are greatly needed in our country, because thousands of people of all ranks and conditions, of the learned and of the unlearned, do not care for the church and the life of the church. They even despise their church, because it adheres to obsolete doctrines, proved to be false by the results of scientific investigation, and compels the people to believe such doctrines, which they must reject in their mind. Thus I have often heard it said: The preachers of the church teach doctrines which they do not believe; they teach so because they are obliged to speak so. And that is a terrible situation.

In accordance with the commandment of our Saviour Jesus Christ and his own venerable example, we consider and love one another as brothers and sisters, and give both spiritual and material help to one another as much as possible; and, according to the same commandment, we love our neighbour as ourselves.

Therefore I was very glad to read in the invitation to this meeting: "In the best possible way the meetings of the International Council will be fraternal, not sectarian. We will erect no walls of separation not already existing. We will aim to ignore them all, while emphasising the great commandment: Love to God and Love to Man." That is the same aim that I strive after with my friends in Koenigsberg; and many, many religiously-minded people in Germany also. And I can assure you that I shall work with might and main that this glorious aim may be accomplished by ourselves or by our descendants.

But, how is that very difficult work to be done? I think there is no other way than by perfect liberty of religious conviction and of the religious life—and, if possible, the perfect observance of that commandment of our Master: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Thus, you see, we have made for ourselves an open way to God by many and great sacrifices, and I believe that we shall have to sacrifice and suffer more in the future. But we are happy now in the possession of religious liberty, liberty of mind and spirit. And you must see, I think, that we are at one with you—that we are working with you, united with you, by the same principles, by the same love, striving together with you towards the same end.

And if there are some who want to have a church, I accept a word I have heard here: The only church of the future is the church of religious liberty and of humanity.

THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN SCANDINAVIA.

BY KRISTOFER JANSON, OF CHRISTIANIA.*

The Writer's Experience.

Mr. Kristofer Janson was educated for the Lutheran Church, having prosecuted his studies at the University of Christiania. He did not, however, enter the ministry of the State Church, but devoted himself to teaching in the High Schools. He also engaged in literary work, and published several novels, dramas, and poems. In 1876, the Norwegian Parliament voted him a salary of 1,600 crowns a year, in recognition of his literary attainments.

While engaged as a teacher in the people's High School, Mr. Janson happened to read a book by the Swedish poet and scientist, Victor Rydberg, on "What the Bible teaches about Christ," and this book quite altered his opinions on several theological questions. The book contained an exposition of Unitarian principles, and defended them on Biblical grounds so earnestly and convincingly, that Mr. Janson found it impossible to refute the arguments. About the same time, he read Dr. Albert Réville's "Life of Theodore Parker, with Extracts from his Sermons." This book opened out new views for him, and he felt that, if he could embrace those views and propagate them in his own land, he would be a happy man and his countrymen a happy people. But to get an audience for such religious ideas was at that time impossible in Norway.

In America.

So Mr. Janson sailed for America. He wanted to see Theodore Parker's fatherland, and to make a fuller acquaintance with the Unitarian faith. He also wanted to study the condition of his countrymen throughout the Western States. From September, 1879, until September, 1880, he travelled among the largest Norwegian settlements; he delivered a great many lectures, and was received with enthusiasm. But with regard to the religious condition of his people, he found that the Lutheran Church of America, which had split into five sects on account of doctrinal controversies, was more fanatical and conservative than its sister church in Norway. During his travels Mr. Janson studied Unitarian literature. When at Chicago, he attended a great meeting in honour of William Ellery Channing, where not only Unitarians, but Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Presbyterians, and others united in praising the blessed influence of Dr. Channing, in spite of their divergencies in theological belief. This display of Christian toleration was quite new to him. Mr. Janson returned home to Norway, but soon afterwards he received a letter from America asking him to come back and preach liberal views to a number of his countrymen, at Minneapolis, Minn. The secretary of the Western Unitarian Conference, the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, promised the assistance of the American Unitarian Association.

Scandinavian Churches in America.

Mr. Janson returned to America and called together a mass meeting in a large hall in Minneapolis. Fifteen hundred attended. He laid before them the principles of Unitarian Christianity, and gave his reasons for holding such views. He asked those who shared his opinions to give their names at the close of the service. The people dispersed, and Mr. Janson waited in vain for his future congregation. At last, an elderly woman entered with a book in her hand. It was the Lutheran Catechism. "Do you intend to teach other things than those contained in this book?" she asked. Mr. Janson told her that the book was excellent in many ways, but that there were some opinions in which he did not quite agree with Luther. "Then I will ask God to curse you and all your work in this city," she cried, and proudly made her exit.

That was the beginning of the Scandinavian Unitarian movement. Before Mr. Janson left the United States, in 1893, he had one congregation at Minneapolis, another at St. Paul, a third at Brown Co., a fourth at Underwood, and a fifth at Hudson, Wisc. At three places church buildings were erected, and at the fourth a plainer house of worship.

These results would have been impossible, if the American Association had not so vigorously and generously assisted the movement. By their aid Mr. Janson's religious books were printed and distributed, including a hymn-book, a treatise, "Is Orthodoxy Right?" a collection of sermons, "Light and Freedom," "Songs of Jesus," and a monthly magazine, the Sower, which lived seven years in America, and then three years in Norway. Mr. Janson had been ordained a Unitarian minister at Chicago, on Nov. 25, 1882.

Home Again.

After twelve years absence, he felt a desire again to see his native land, and try if the ears of the people were now open to more rational views of religion. He delivered lectures on "What Intelligent Young People now demand of Religion," in the cities and in many of the villages; everywhere he was received with enthusiasm. Of course, there was opposition. Fanatical newspaper articles appeared, in which he was called anti-Christ, and people were told that they would go to hell if they listened to such an heretic. But the curiosity of the people was too great. People came, and the watchmen of Zion comforted each other in the hope that Mr. Janson would soon go back to America.

The welcome he received was quite a surprise to Mr. Janson. At some places the applause was quite demonstrative. It showed him that many people were no longer satisfied with the old doctrines. At a mass meeting in the capital, he closed his sermon by saying: "And now, I do not know, friends, what to do—whether to go back to America or remain here and try to preach a liberal gospel." And the whole audience cried, "Stay with us! Stay with us!"

That call decided Mr. Janson. Since that time he has worked in his native land, with Christiania as his centre. His work in America is continued by Mr. Norman and Mr. Haugerud, Norwegians, who graduated at the MeadvilleTheological School, and by Mr. Erichsen, formerly a Methodist minister.

But when the news spread that Mr. Janson intended to remain and preach his heresy, the pulpits and the newspapers made a violent attack upon him. His name became an object of fear, and though the opposition in later years has abated, he still experiences some difficulty in carrying on his work.

Mr. Janson founded a congregation at Christiania, consisting mostly of working men and mechanics. The number of actual members was not large, but his audience on Sundays sometimes reached from 700 to 800. Now, the question arose whether Unitarians were included in the law relating to Dissenters or not. The words of the law are:—"Dissenters, whereby in this present law is understood persons who profess the Christian religion without being members of the State Church." And in a later paragraph:—"This law also includes members of the Mosaic faith."

Are Unitarians Christians?

The question, laid before the Church department of the State, was whether Unitarians were recognised as Christian Dissenters. This was answered in the negative, because they did not believe in the deity of Christ. The little Unitarian flock then sent in to the Parliament in the year 1897 a proposal that the words of the first paragraph should read: "Dissenters, whereby in this present law is understood persons who profess the Christian religion—herein also included Unitarians." Or as another alternative:—"This law includes members of the Mosaic faith, as well as Unitarians."

The last alternative was adopted, and Unitarians are now in Norway recognised as a tolerated sect, protected by the law, permitted to perform their church rites according to their own belief, but they are not recognised as Christians. It is ridiculous that we are denied the Christian name, especially when our statutes declare that "We would try to preach the principles of Jesus and live up to them," and our watchword is: "Yearning for truth, and in the spirit of Jesus we unite in order to serve God by serving and loving mankind."

But the place alongside the countrymen of Jesus is also a good place. In the neighbouring countries of Denmark and Sweden, Unitarians are not recognised at all. In the latter country they have tried several times to obtain public recognition, but in vain.

Unitarianism and the People.

What attitude does the mass of the public take towards the Unitarian gospel? It is the same here as in most other places: there are more Unitarians inside the orthodox churches than outside, for people do not care to break with the State Church and thereby deprive themselves of many civil rights and social advantages, and so they remain inside the old Church. Others—and those the more intelligent and refined—have lost all interest in religion, because the form in which religion is offered to them seems childish and harsh, and because the Church has closed its gates against free investigation.

The people who have nothing to risk by joining a new religious society are the middle classes, and they are eager to listen to the new gospel. Mr. Janson's experience both in America and at home is that the first-comers are the radicals, who enjoy the denunciation of the old dogmas. But when they discover that the Unitarian gospel is to build up and not only to tear down, and that it places a greater responsibility upon them and demands a pure life, that it is not only an ethical but a religious movement, then many of them leave. This was also one of the reasons why Mr. Janson resigned his position as official minister: the radical wing of his congregation tried to turn the movement into an ethical society. Besides preaching on Sunday morning, Mr. Janson gave literary readings on Sunday evenings, mostly from the rich dramatic literature of Norway. He has also delivered religious lectures in Sweden and Denmark, and friends in both lands have aided him in performing his work.

* A paper contributed to the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, at Essex Hall, in Whit-week.

Sweden and Denmark.

In Sweden the soil ought to be more prepared for Unitarianism, because the works of Dr. Channing and Theodore Parker have been translated into Swedish, and native authors have taught liberal views, such as Victor Rydberg and Nils Lilja. There are also a number of young theologians, very intelligent and able men, who have joined the liberal wing of the orthodox church in Germany, led by Ritschl, Harnack, and others. But the majority of the ruling clergy in Sweden are very conservative, and it is much more difficult to promote reform there than in the more democratic country of Norway.

In Denmark, Mr. Janson has also lectured in Copenhagen. A former minister of the State Church, Uffe Birkedal, holds Unitarian services every Sunday forenoon. Nevertheless, neither he nor the members of his little society have officially broken with the State Church, and they have not yet asked for recognition as Unitarians. Their organ, called Light for the Land, edited by Theo. Berg, is now published weekly. Another young minister, Anton Jensen, has been forced to resign his position in the State Church on account of his protest against the doctrine of an eternal hell. It is said that he will try to form a free congregation for the support and spread of a liberal gospel.

Mr. Janson himself spends his summers in Denmark, in the neighbourhood of Aarhus, Jutland, and preaches to an audience in the city of 150 to 200 every Sunday.

A Travelling Lecturer and Missionary.

In Norway of late years some university extension work has been started, and Mr. Janson is very much sought as a lecturer. His many travels and frequent absence from Christiania made it difficult for him to attend to his duties as a minister, and therefore he resigned his position as official minister in 1899, and he may now be considered as a travelling missionary. Nevertheless, he keeps up his Sunday meetings as before, and his audience varies from 300 to 600 persons.

The small Unitarian body—seventy-four members in all—is now without any official minister. The president of the congregation is Mr. Gaaserud, a paper dealer in the city.

The Liberal Leaven.

The Unitarian movement among the Scandinavians will act more as a leaven in the old churches than by the forming of new and separate churches. And anyone who understands the signs of the times will see that inside the orthodox churches there is much more liberalism now than there was twenty years ago. Some of the Lutheran ministers themselves have published books and newspaper articles which would have been considered very heretical a few years ago, especially where they protest against the old-fashioned interpretations of the Bible, and they now lay more stress upon practical work than upon dogmatic belief. Liberal religious thought moves forward, inch by inch.

PHILLIPS BROOKS.

In The Inquirer of May 25 we published a full review of Professor Allen's "Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks" (Macmillan and Co.), but the life of the eloquent Boston preacher is so rich in interest, and so near to our own special sympathies, that many of our readers, we feel sure, will be glad to have this further account of him.

In 1893 Phillips Brooks passed away, at the age of 57, having been the previous year elected Bishop of Massachusetts, some clerical dissentients notwithstanding.

His parents were of good Nonconformist ancestry, but early in life they joined the Episcopal Church, and three of their five sons became clergymen. Phillips, the second son, after leaving Harvard College, was engaged as usher at the Latin Public School, with a view of becoming a teacher, and here occurred the one failure of his life. He was well qualified by his classical knowledge to fulfil the duties of the post, but he had not enough "governing power" to master the riotous class of youths but a few years his juniors, and the headmaster felt obliged to request his assistant to resign. This was naturally a great trial to the young man, but it led to the wish of his mother's heart being fulfilled, in his decision to study for the ministry. He proceeded to a Theological College at Alexandria in Virginia, where he spent three years in not very congenial surroundings. Slavery was dominant—1856 to 1865—and the régime of student-life rather severe. But Phillips Brooks was too earnest to be discouraged, and won the highest distinction.

His first appointment was to the Church of the Advent in Philadelphia; here he remained thirteen years a power for good, in political and social as well as in Church life, taking part in Anti-Slavery and other reforms, too often passed by on the other side of the way by the clergy.

In his thirty-fifth year his native city of Boston claimed him, and after much hesitation he yielded to the claim and relinquished, with many heart pangs, the congregation and kindly social surroundings of his cure of souls in Philadelphia to which he always reverted with the warmth of a first love—the scene of his early efforts and "enthusiasm of humanity."

In Boston, where Phillips Brooks worked faithfully for twenty-two years, he found a wider sphere in which to fulfil his "God-given best," and his family rejoiced in his return, which was not the less grateful to his own warm home affections.

In Trinity Church, and in his ministrations at Harvard College, Cambridge, adjoining Boston, by force of his eloquence and the noble influence that he exerted, he became one of the greatest powers for good in the United States. His interest and sympathies were not limited to the Episcopal Church. He invited Unitarian ministers to the Communion, and held out the right hand of fellowship to them in good works, on the broadest platform in every good cause. Civil Service Reform, National Needs and Remedies, Progress, Tolerance, Social and Political Reforms, Literature and Life, are among the subjects of extra-pulpit addresses. He took part in putting an end to compulsory attendance at chapel by the Harvard students.

He spent a holiday year in India, and appropriately presided at a meeting at Channing Hall, Boston, to introduce the Pundita Ramabai, who is now doing such valuable work at Poona, rescuing thousands of her Indian sisters from the degradation of widowhood and the other wrongs that are legally permitted and practised on women in India.

Phillips Brooks' eloquence was of a peculiarly rare and rich order, abounding in learning and imagination, as broad as humanity, of world-wide sweep in sympathy. It fascinated you, and you were carried along irresistibly. He spoke very rapidly, and with an enkindling earnestness that never flagged. He had a commanding position in Boston, and worked to the full limit of his strength. But his congregation generously set him at liberty every few years, and supplied him with means for a European tour. He was highly honoured in this country, and frequently preached in London at Westminster Abbey and elsewhere, and at Oxford and Cambridge. He was well acquainted with Dean Stanley, Ruskin, Tennyson, Farrar, M. Arnold, and other kindred spirits. He visited most of the countries of Europe, including Spain, and he crossed the Pacific to visit Japan. All this experience was reflected and reproduced in his sermons and his many published volumes, and added much to his happiness and usefulness.

Phillips Brooks never married, not from any ascetic objection, but, as he said, because the right woman did not come along at a propitious time. His life was very full, and he was tenderly sympathetic, but he felt some regret that the supreme experience of marriage and parenthood never came to him. As evidence of the esteem in which he was held at Harvard a Phillips Brooks House was founded, to which the English contributions to his memory were added to those of his class of 1855. This house is dedicated to his memory, and to Piety, Charity, and Hospitality, and bears on a tablet in the central hall this inscription:—

"A Preacher of Righteousness and Hope; Majestic in Stature; impetuous in Utterance; Rejoicing in the Truth; unhampered by Bonds of Church or Station. He brought by his Life and Doctrine Fresh Faith to a people, Fresh Meaning to Ancient Creeds. To this University he gave constant Love, Large Service and High Example."

Another tribute to him not less graphic and glowing is by Thorold, Bishop of Winchester, prefixed to a volume of sermons:—

"To the dear Memory of Phillips Brooks, Bishop of Massachusetts, strong, fearless, tender, eloquent, incapable of meanness, blazing with indignation at all kinds of wrong, his heart and mind deep and wide as the ocean at his door. Simple and transparent as a child, keen with all the keenness of his race, this volume is inscribed by a brother across the water, who cherishes his friendship as a treasure laid up in Heaven at the resurrection of the just."

In 1888 the present writer heard Phillips Brooks for the first time in his own beautiful Trinity Church in Boston; the sermon was on "The Epistles, the oldest and most genuine documents in the New Testament." He treated the subject in the broadest and most realistic style, making Paul and his environment quite vivid to us. A few days before, the death had occurred of the Rev. James Freeman Clarke, the distinguished Unitarian minister, who, he said, was an "Epistle from God to the Church in Boston." Here are the concluding words of his sermon:—"I cannot stand here to-day without a tribute of affectionate and reverent remembrance to Dr. James Freeman Clarke, the minister of the Church of the Disciples, the friend and helper of souls. How much that name has meant in Boston these last forty years! When I think of his long life; when I remember what identification he has had with all that has been noblest in every movement of the public conscience and the public soul; when I see how, in the days of the great national struggle, from first to last, he was not only true to freedom, but a very captain in her armies, and a power of wisdom and inspiration in her councils; when I think what words of liberty the slave and the bigot have heard from his lips; when I think how his studies have illuminated not merely our own faith, but all the great religions; when I see how much of Christ was in his daily walk among us, in his unswerving truthfulness, his quiet independence, his tenderness and strength, his pity for the sinner, and his hatred of the sin; when I think how he loved Christ—when all this gathers in my memory at the tidings of his death, the city, the country, the Church, the world, seem emptier and poorer. He belonged to the whole Church of Christ. Through him his Master spoke to all who had ears to hear. Especially he was a living epistle to the Church of Christ, which is in Boston. It is a beautiful—a solemn moment, when the city, the Church, the world, gather up the completeness of a finished life like his, and thank God for it, and place it in the shrine of memory, to be a power and a revelation thenceforth, so long as city, and Church, and world shall last. It is not the losing, it is rather the gaining, the assuring of his life. Whatever he has gone to in the great mystery beyond, he remains a word of God here in the world he loved. Let us thank our Heavenly Father for the life, the work, the inspiration of His servant, His true saint, James Freeman Clarke!"

Part of this tribute, beginning with the words "He belonged to the whole Church of Christ," is now an autograph beneath the portrait of James Freeman Clarke, in the Church of the Disciples, where he ministered in Boston. R. Moore.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "The Soul's Way to God," by the Rev. Charles Beard.

Religion is based upon certain primitive instincts of human nature which utterly refuse, in the soul which is conscious of them, to be reasoned out of existence; nay, much more, are felt to be among the deepest and strongest and most permanent constituents of humanity. I know nothing stranger in the history of our race than this indestructibility of religious aspiration, this irresistible set of the spirit, if I may so speak, towards divine realities, which can neither be seen by the eye, nor touched by the hand, nor heard with the ear, but only felt in the depth of the soul. The faculty does not exist in every man, I know, at all events in a self-conscious state; and if one comes and says, "There is nothing in me which agrees with this word," you have no answer to give him. But the same thing is the case, and much more frequently and absolutely, with other human capacities: to the man born blind you cannot speak of colours, and your talk of sweet sounds is without meaning to the unmusical ear. And there are times at which this faculty seems to sleep in those who do to some extent possess it: mere youth and health and the joy of living may lull it for a time to rest; and, much more, habitual worldliness and base self-indulgence. All sin, consciously committed and persisted in, is a fatal anodyne to the soul's divine hunger; while, again, there is no man, not even the devoutest, across whose spirit do not sweep flowing and ebbing tides of Godward desire, flooding his whole nature, now with a sense of the Infinite, and again leaving it for a while almost cold and bare and dry. While, once more, it is emphatically true that this faculty of seeing God is capable, like every other, of conscious cultivation: that we must seek the Infinite if we would have the Infinite find us: that the cold heart, which is quite content with its chill, may beat for many a long year without feeling the glow of God: while the spirit that loves and needs the sun rarely wanders beyond reach of its rays. But taking all these things into the account, we may surely say that there is nothing in humanity so ineradicable as its religiousness. Here it takes the coarsest symbolic form, and allies itself with lust and cruelty; there it strives to draw its breath in the most rarefied atmosphere of philosophical speculation: now it moulds the habits and passions of a people, expressing itself in the outward form of their life; again it is the secretest thought of the sage who ponders the mystery of existence: it soars in the cathedral spire and echoes through the vaulted aisles, and compels every beautiful art to put forth its finest activity in its service; or utters itself only in the still, small voice of conscience, or trembles on the lips of sympathy, or silently thrills through the hero's heart. But it is one and the same vitality which pours its sap through every branch and leaf of the great tree of human faith and aspiration.

Prayer and the answer to prayer, obedience and the strength which follows upon obedience, purity of heart and its reward of the beatific vision—all these must be conceived of as essentially the same, whether in their strongest or least perfect manifestations; and there is no sharp line of distinction to be drawn between the comfort which God may have given to some doubting, distressed soul to-day, and the consolation which He poured into His Son's heart as he knelt beneath the olive-trees of Gethsemane. But then, while differences of kind in this matter are inconceivable, differences of degree may be so great as to be practically immeasurable. It seems to me a waste of words to debate as to what constitutes a special revelation in any philosophical sense: I do not see that we have any data by which to decide the controversy. I think it something worse than useless to exalt Christ for the purpose of proving that God does not speak to us; or to magnify the revelation of to-day, to show that that of eighteen hundred years ago was less signal than men have been wont to think it. Whoever believes in revelation at all, can hardly overlook, and ought not to wish to lessen, the significance of the fact that, historically speaking, Christ has been the great Shepherd of souls, bringing back, as no other prophet, millions of human hearts to God. In the records of our race he is a fact as gloriously visible as the sun in the noon-day sky; and I can only attribute the insensibility to his divine beauty, manifested by some even of religious souls, to the exaggerated claims which many centuries have made for him, but which he never made for himself. And then (I speak for myself alone, I know not how it may be with others), while I profoundly believe in the revelation of to-day, and cannot in any other way explain the existence of religion, I do not find that it at all exempts me from the necessity of application to the records of the past, but much rather has its chief value in placing me in a natural relation to them. Were I wholly dependent upon the insight of my own soul, had I no other knowledge of God than He has vouchsafed to me in the recesses of my own spirit, had I no stay of trust but such as my own faithfulness has won for me, I were indeed poor and miserable and blind and naked! I know little more than how little I know: but I can listen, I can love, I can follow. I too am of the lineage and language of the saints: I know my Master when I see him: and the more I know him, the deeper is my trust, the more faithful my affection. Surely it is really so with us all: only the very strongest souls can live alone with God and be content: for the rest we rely one upon another: none can dispense with the help of any: and the witness of all is joyful in the ears of every one. Because I am a man, my heart thrills in unison with the universal aspirations of humanity; and I follow Christ in proportion to my deep conviction that I too am a child of God.

God has for us yonder, by and by, I know not what noble ministries and exalted places of beauty and power. Since He knows what niche we are to fill, trust Him to shape us to it. Since He knows what work we are to do, trust Him to drill us to the proper preparation.—M. J. Savage.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Dear Children,

Two years ago we had some pleasant rambles together, in the neighbourhood of beautiful Windermere. At present I am staying in another part of the Lake District, just whereabouts you will find out by and by. Suppose we call it "Sunset Valley" for it runs nearly East and West, and so towards sunset the mountains and crags that seem to block the east-end of the valley catch the last low rays of the setting sun, and there are glorious tints on summit and on crag, and still more glorious and glowing colour on the clouds that float about and above them.

Now for a journey through Sunset Valley. We are gathered at its western extremity, right on the Cumberland Coast, and, if the weather is clear, the Isle of Man plainly in view forty miles away.

We have nine or ten miles to travel, so please skip into this railway train that is in waiting for you. It is a funny little train and may make you smile, but I assure you it is very useful to us valley folks. In the winter and in quiet times there is only one carriage attached to the engine, but to-day with such a number of you there are three carriages, a guard's van, and four small open trucks with forms in them. If you cannot all find room I am afraid some of you will have to wait, and go in the next train, for I don't think there are any more carriages, and, if there were, I am afraid the engine could not pull them. A little whistle comes from the little engine, and the little train starts, and soon we have a good deal of fun and laughing, for the carriages lurch about more than we are accustomed to, and sometimes we almost come to a stop on some of the steeper gradients. However, all goes well, and we step out at our terminus, having done the seven miles or so in just three-quarters of an hour.

Yes, yes; I hear your chorus of questions—"Where are we?" "What are we going to do?" "Where are we going to?"—so I will keep the secret no longer.

We are in the railway station at Boot—don't smile, please, you town children who are used to great stations swarming with people—and we are going to march about three miles further up the dale, to inspect the remains of a Roman Camp, and to form more or less valuable opinions about it.

We cross an old stone bridge, with a grey old companion water-mill, and across a wee beck trickling over the rocks and winding through the stones that form its course. It is not always a wee beck, and it does not always trickle; not long ago I saw it after a heavy thunder-shower, and it came in great leaps and spouts and a madly rushing stream that shouted aloud as it fell into yon caldron, and worked there in foam and fury.

Tramp, tramp, steadily along, with our faces to the pass that rises eastwards, and reaching it, up, up a steep and winding path till we are 800 feet above the sea-level, and more than half-way up Hard Knott, for that is the name of the pass we are ascending. Perhaps you think Hard Knott a curious name, but the next pass has a still stranger one, for it is called Wry Nose.

A few steps to the left of our track and the Roman Camp is before us. It forms a square, each side measuring about 120 yards, with low towers at each corner, and four entrances, one in the centre of each side. Toward the middle of the square thus enclosed are the remains of the buildings that gave shelter to the officers and men, and probably to their horses also. Please bear in mind that this was not merely a temporary camp, but a permanent one, garrisoned year in and year out. We can still trace the substantial form of many of the buildings, can still find a few carefully-hewn and dressed corner-stones, which, from their description, must have been quarried at least eleven miles away. In one or two instances we can still see the socket-stones where once a gate or door swung on its pin.

Fragments of hard red tile can be picked up here and there, and it is marvellous to note how clean and fresh they look—some with a slight pattern on them, as sharp and distinct as though made but yesterday.

Yet we know, from an inscribed stone found here, that the camp was built by the Second Cohort of the Legion of Agricola, probably about the year A.D. 82. There is something to think about, something to set your imagination to work. The masters of the world once occupied the very spot we are standing on. Many a Roman sentinel has paced his watch here, his eye noting, as ours notes, the long valley, opening and widening as it trends toward the sea; then a gleam of yellow sands; beyond that a broad band of sea; and, hanging in the clear air far away, the fair outline of the Isle of Man.

Then, as the sentry swings on his heel, he sees on his right the great shoulder of Scafell slope up, and still up, till it changes into crags, and pinnacles, and precipice.

Our antiquarian friends tell us that this camp was adapted to accommodate about 450 men, and it is probable that it formed the connecting link between another camp at Ravenglass, and a third at Ambleside. Outside the main walls of our camp are several detached buildings, one of them judged to have been a small Temple. Some hundred yards further up the hillside, we find a very interesting spot—the parade or exercise ground of the garrison. With great labour, a comparatively smooth surface has been formed, partly by removing the high ground, and partly by banking up the lower portion, and altogether forming a space where a good number of troops could be drilled.

A few years ago some antiquarians got permission to carefully search the site of the camp and to dig for remains of vessels or implements or arms. Two months were spent over the work and a goodly number of interesting articles were found, and an account of them and drawings of some of them are to be had in a small book.

It is thought, however, that many articles have been carried away by previous explorers, and this is quite likely, for numerous stones which once formed part of the walls or other buildings are even now to be found in some of the old farm-houses in this and adjoining valleys.

The slanting rays of the sun remind us that we must not stay too long in the old mountain stronghold, interesting though it be, so bravely we trudge back talking of what we have seen. And as we reach our journey's end twilight has fallen, the air is cool, and as we take one more backward look towards Hard Knott a great white wave of mist rolls down and hangs in mid-air like a great breaker across the pass.

The camp has vanished from our sight, but it still lives in our memory and holds, and is held in, our imagination.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

Writing in the Christian Register of our International meetings in Whit-week, Mrs. Martha Perry Lowe dwells upon their great significance, and in the following pleasant passage tells of how the glow of feeling has extended from this country across the Atlantic:—

We have gathered our enthusiasm largely from The Inquirer and reading the addresses; but it is really the glow of The Inquirer itself which has warmed us, the overflowing delight of its editor, the joy of its contributors in the spectacle of brotherly affection, burning zeal, high hope, and spiritual aspirations which animated all the meetings. Some of the notices have been touching in their expression of grateful surprise that a company of Unitarian people could be so warm and tender towards the great themes of Divine Love and Service to Man.

We say that the world is ready and ripe for our thought. Yes, for our intellectual thought. But we are giving too much of that. There are a great many persons, undoubtedly, who think with us theologically and want nothing more. That is called being a Unitarian. But there is a large company also of people, young and old, who want to hear the expression of religious feeling, and will go where they can get it—most likely to the Christian Science churches. They think that these Christians love their religion, love each other, and are happy. Now we have got this whole saving gospel as much as these other religionists. We believe in the application of the spiritual laws to the body as well as the soul. We have got rid of all the old Calvinistic errors, and nobody cares much about defending them. The coast is clear for us. Our chances are as good as any other church, if we will only have love. Let us not talk about theism, a cold term, but about the One himself, God! Let us not continually discuss the question whether to go back to the Nazarene Jesus or to seek the ideal Christ but rather unite in loving him as a glorified human being, going higher and higher in the scale of humanity, helping this world still as his loved native home by the sweet influences of his spirit, and bringing men on earth and in heaven nearer and nearer to the Father.

We have wandered away from our talk about the International Conference; but what is our work is their work. The signs of promise which they see at this conference of a new spiritual birth, an awakening of love, we earnestly hope and pray for in our church—a baptism of the Holy Spirit among our ministers and people which shall make us talk more—or, at least, as much—about right living as right thinking, as much about the joy of the things of the spirit as of the accuracy of the written word.

LONDON, AUGUST 24, 1901.

"CHRIST THE REVEALER."

THE sermons on "Christ the Revealer," by the Rev. JOHN HAMILTON THOM, were originally published in 1859, not long after the resumption of his ministry in Liverpool after a three years' rest, and during the period when many of the sermons now collected in the volumes of the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ" were being preached. There is in them abundant material for the guidance of our thought in pondering the great questions of spiritual religion, and they gain an added interest when studied side by side with the sermons of Dr MARTINEAU, and especially those two sermons on "Christ the Divine Word," to which we referred last week.

It is not unlikely that many grateful readers of these sermons, gaining from them abundant light and inspiration, may yet not be able to accept some of the absolute affirmations of the preacher concerning CHRIST as in his own person manifesting "all that in this world human eyes can see, human obedience can embody, of the harmonised Image of GOD"; and yet it appears to us unquestionable that in these sermons we are led in the true way of discipleship, to realise the greatness of our calling as spiritual sons of GOD. In the person of CHRIST Mr. THOM sees "the end of God in Mortal Humanity, the type of being He is seeking here to develop in every child He has."

This is to exhaust the meaning of the two great titles which define his relations on the Divine and the Human side of his being: Son of God, as showing all of the Father's spirit that Human Nature when most filial is here capable of receiving: Son of Man, as the normal result and product, the spiritual development, of "what is in Man." God has no spiritual glory that is not imaged in "His Holy Child": Humanity has no spiritual germ that is not developed in its Saviour, in him who made it whole.

Whether we are able to affirm for ourselves, or not, that "GOD has no spiritual glory that is not imaged in 'His Holy Child,'" we may follow with complete conviction the unfolding of the truth as to the spiritual nature which is in man, through which alone, by the revealing of the present Spirit, he is able to recognise what is divine in JESUS, and feel him to be the very ideal of our common humanity.

Thus we find the fundamental fact of the religiousness of our nature described in such a passage as the following:—

If through the life of Prayer we are in communication with the Spirit of our Father, who is ever gently striving to reveal Himself in us, then we are not dealing with any final or outward measures of Truth and Duty, but with their ever-living Source, and light from the Fount of light is entering into us as we are able to bear it. Of course this representation of Religion proceeds upon the assumed fact, as the finding of our experience, that God does give promptings and communications from Himself to the soul and conscience that are daily turned to Him, waiting to receive—communications not in the forms of intellectual Truth, but in new quickenings of the spirit, in the sense of a life stirring in us that is not our own, in the consciousness of a Goodness and a Holiness moving us forwards and never suffering us to stay and rest content with what we are, as though our Nature could ever be a measure for itself—and in the consequent convictions of deep peace, that we are not our own, nor in our own keeping, but if we will believe it, the children of a Spirit from whom comes all that we have or are, whose Light we are receiving, whose Promptings we are obeying, whose Promises we are trusting, whose Love we are feeling, and who, as the underlying Spring of whatever stirs or emanates in us, is alone the measure or the limit of our being and our growth. (Christ the Revealer, New Ed., pp. 66–7.)

And again in this later passage :—

How are we to know more and more of the inspiration and attraction of God? Only by obedience to what is given; only by not quenching the Spirit. To him that hath is given. Just as a child learns to know the spirit, the wisdom, and the love of an earthly parent by submitting to his discipline, by observing all his regulations, and waiting for the fruits, do we come to know God by the trust that obeys. His character is in the commandments that He gives. In obeying, we open our nature to His grace. It is grace upon grace; His grace that leads us to obey, and fuller grace following on obedience. The Merciful know that He is merciful: the Pure in heart see Him as He is; those that hunger and thirst for Righteousness know that they are filled: the Meek enjoy this glorious world as His, without one troublesome or covetous thought about possessing it, not exposed to any wound through pretension, vanity, or pride. A wise, loving, and holy God gives inward promptings, and express commandments, that open to His children Wisdom, Love, and Holiness. Christ had no higher direction for those who were seeking to know God and eternal Life than this: Keep the commandments. Obey Him, and He will make His abode with you. Submit to the Hand that leads you, and you will be drawn closer to Him. Serve Him, and you will know that you are not Servants, but Sons. (Christ the Revealer, New Ed., pp. 143-4.)

On such foundations our religious life is firmly grounded. The Divine Spirit stirring within bids us look up to the light, and grow up into the more perfect manhood. And when we ask how that manhood is to be made complete in the fulness of the Divine purpose, which even in the twilight of an imperfect knowledge we learn perfectly to trust, the clearest answer comes to us from JESUS, and from the growing power of the Christian life. Mr. THOM finds it perfectly expressed in the person of JESUS :—

Now if a full communion with God is the object and end of the religious life in each of us—and if the aid we can afford to one another through the warmth of sympathy, by reflection of that portion of the Infinite Light which we severally receive, is the justifying ground of Churches—then it is clear that the central figure in the Church on earth, our Guide, our Leader, and our Head, must be that Person who has brought this Human Nature of ours into the fullest communion with God at all points of spiritual contact—whose spirit is the fullest Image of the Father of us all—whose Life, being the most deeply-rooted in the Divine Truth and the Divine Benignity, is the most harmonious in all its outgoings—and who therefore is endowed with the largest power to act upon, and open, every latent spiritual susceptibility which God has put into our being—the very Sun of Righteousness, collecting in himself all the rays which fall singly upon us—the Glory of which we severally have only one or more of the separate beams—the very Likeness of Him whose lineaments appear only one by one in us, and even that only in germ and faintness. The Head of the Church is that Person who "shows" most fully to his brethren their common Father—through whose spirit to our existing, but undeveloped, sensibilities the largest measure of the Divine Glory streams forth with living power. (Christ the Revealer, New Ed., pp. 73-4.)

What may be the whole measure of that which CHRIST reveals is not a thing to be dogmatically stated. Each disciple must find for himself what is the truth, and live by whatever light is granted to him. And here we will only add one more passage, from a later sermon—Mr. THOM's farewell sermon, as minister of Renshaw-street Chapel—as a help towards the consideration of the question, what the mediation of CHRIST really means in our religious life :—

None of us are spiritually taught until God Himself teaches us, and the great office of a Son of God in our humanity is to lead us into the real Presence and leave us there, having removed every veil that could hide our Father's face. We call him Mediator, and so he is, the highest conceivable, because himself the Image of God in Man. Only let us ever remember that it is not the office of a Mediator to detain a soul with himself, but to place it in personal communion with the Fountain of life. In the spiritual sense everything to us is Mediation, except the direct touch of God's Spirit. When the heavens declare His glory, and the firmament sheweth forth His handiwork, when day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night declareth knowledge—all this is mediation: but the perfect Mediator is—I use the language of Scripture—"the Man Christ Jesus," to all who like himself are—again I use the language of Scripture—"partakers of the Divine nature"—the Mediator, who revealed God by being like to God, to whom the Spirit that speaks in our spirits bears witness in that which he said of himself, that "whatsoever things he seeth the Father do, these things doeth the Son likewise." These are the attitudes of receptiveness, of waiting to renew our life, in which as his brethren the Son places us towards the Father; and whatever spiritual knowledge, in the progressions of all the ages, may come to souls who thus filially live with God, and study God in all His ways, in all His laws, in all His inspirations, that, though it has yet to come to light, we regard as belonging to the inexhaustible riches of God in Christ, a portion of the inheritance that is waiting us as heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. (The Church of God's Building, 1867, pp. 14-16.)

"WHAT THINK YE OF THE CHRIST?"

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

It is our answer to that question which seems to divide us most seriously from orthodoxy. We are often told that our church is based on the belief that Jesus was a mere man. First of all the phrase "a mere man" is a very bad one: it implies contempt instead of reverence for humanity. Anyone who begins to feel what is in man as Jesus felt it can never think contemptuously of human nature again. If we know anything of real love, if we have felt the power and beauty of heroism and self-sacrifice, if we have caught a glimpse of the divine depths of another human soul we can never talk of a mere man again. True manhood and womanhood will for ever be for us an infinitely beautiful sacred thing, limitless in its possibilities, instinct with the divine.

Further, we who believe in the humanity of Jesus and disbelieve that he was God have to remind others that our Church is not founded on this doctrine. It is the danger of the name Unitarian that it seems to convey the idea that we stand for the denial of the Deity of Christ and that no one who believes in his Deity can be a full member of our Church. This is distinctly not the fact. Our churches are assemblies of free worshippers: no creed is imposed. Any one who feels sufficiently in sympathy with our worship to wish to join us, is thereby proved to be a fitting member of our church.

We feel that to believe in divine love as ruling the world and in the claims of such love upon us to love and work for one another is to have a religion, whether we call that divine love, God or Christ.

The danger of taking Christ as our God is not that we cannot feel the same constraint upon us and the same help: our religious feelings may be precisely the same whichever name we use. The danger is that in taking Christ for God our religion is less firmly founded: it is founded on certain texts, and texts taken chiefly from John's Gospel, which is the least historic of the four. If our faith practically consists in believing that Christ was God, it is a faith which can be shaken by Biblical criticism, it depends on a certain view of history and if that conception of history is shaken then for the time being we are left without any God at all. To believe in God on the testimony of our own experience and reason and on the testimony of countless men and women who have felt the reality of the Unseen Love for themselves, is to base our faith on something which no Biblical Criticism can shake. But so far as the present possession of a religion is concerned, although one is more insecure than the other, the actual religion of a man who calls God Christ may be identical with the religion of a man who calls God our Father. They mean the same thing and give it different names. The Trinitarian is not out of place in our churches: the only type of man who is out of place is the man who does not think, and who passively accepts whatever teaching happens to be given from the pulpit. Our churches are free and not only concede the right of thought as a privilege but demand it as a duty. Every man and woman must have a religion of their own, must use their own reason, must face their own doubts, must form their own conclusions. They are not asked to accept a creed either that of the minister or of the majority of the congregation. The utmost others can do is to help them to realise the power of their own soul more clearly, and to arouse them to a sense of the greatness of the strife. Whatever opinions then we form of Jesus we are equally in place in our free churches.

As a fact, no doubt the great majority of us believe in the humanity of Jesus and do not believe that he was God, and a vast number of people outside all the Churches do the same. The danger of such a position is that Jesus sometimes counts for little or nothing. It is indeed not to those for whom Jesus is everything, but to those for whom Jesus is little or nothing that I write.

There is a great deal of what may be called Biblical Agnosticism at the present day among people who have an idea more or less vague about the results of Biblical Criticism. They hear that the Higher Criticism has rejected the literal truth of the Birth Stories and the Resurrection, and most if not all of the miracles. They see how these legendary elements are almost inextricably interwoven with the sayings and doings of Jesus, and they doubt if anything historical is left. Why accept the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, the parables, and many other great sayings of Jesus and reject absolutely so much else which seems involved with them? What right have you to pick and choose, to select what you like to believe and reject what you don't like? I will have all or nothing, says the Biblical Agnostic; if half is untrue, how can I be sure of the truth of the other half? And first in answer to that doubt, whether we can know anything of Jesus, I would say that this picking and choosing is the method inevitably adopted in dealing with every other ancient history. No one dreams of accepting without questions all that Herodotus or Livy writes: and yet we recognise that these historians give us on the whole a real insight into the life of their times and of still earlier times than their own. Indeed, it is to this method which rejects and compares and weighs evidence that we owe the great advances in our historical knowledge today. This method of standing in judgment, of reading between the lines, of rejecting one thing and accepting another has helped us to know more of ancient Greece than Herodotus knew, and more of ancient Rome than Livy knew. There is no reason to think of this method of comparing and rejecting as if it shook the foundations of all historic certainty: it is the method by which historic knowledge is gained, not lost, and all the best histories are written under the guidance of such criticism which is at once unsparing and sympathetic.

And then, secondly, in answer to the doubt whether we can know anything definite about Jesus, I would say that the real Jesus is his own evidence. The spirit and teachings of Jesus carry the proof of his existence with them, and just because of their greatness and beauty enable us to know his soul as we can know few others in history. No criticism, no conceivable discovery of documents proving that the Jesus described in the Gospels had never existed, can destroy Jesus: in disproving the existence of one Jesus, they would prove the existence of another. It would take a man as great as Jesus to invent Jesus.

If, to take a perfectly wild hypothesis, Jesus is an invention and the gospels a romance, then the creator of the sayings of Jesus and the spirit of his life must have been in his own spirit as great as the Jesus whom he created. Let me try to explain this apparently extravagant statement. The power to photograph another is no proof of likeness to him. A fool can photograph a wise man: a sinner can photograph a saint. Great care and technical skill may enable an artist of very inferior soul to produce a good copy of Raphael. And yet even in copying, I think I am right in saying, the best is not realised, the something which lies behind colour and form, when an artist of less feeling and depth copies a great picture. Certainly to create another picture as great as Raphael's, a man must be as great as he. No artist can put a soul into his work which is not in himself. Think of the supposed saints of ordinary novelists: how unreal and sickly and inartistic they are! how unpleasant they make goodness! This straining to produce a goodness which is not in themselves, and which they don't understand, results in making a type of goodness which is ridiculous or stupid. Much harm is done by vulgar writers of fiction who try to create ideal characters. They create a monstrosity, an impossibility, a thing all out of drawing: they tell us this is what we ought to admire, and we turn away with delight to the villain of the piece, who is much more real because the writer knows something about him. Even Shakespeare never tried to draw an ideal man. There is great wit and vividness, and sympathy and kindness and grand imagination and far-reaching thought in his noblest characters of men and women, and we know that these qualities were in Shakespeare himself, otherwise they could not have been in his characters, but he never tries to create a saint: he must have known it was not in him.

Milton in memorable words has expressed this need of personal greatness if a man is to write worthily of greatness. "He who would not be frustrated of his hope to write well hereafter in laudable things ought himself to be a true poem, not presuming to sing high praises of heroic men or famous cities unless he have in himself the experience and practice of all that which is praiseworthy." I say then that the teachings and personality of Jesus, if by any possible chance they were fictitious, must have been created by as great a man as he. The greatest sayings of Jesus and the spirit of his life bring their own witness with them.

And lastly, in speaking to those who doubt if we can know much of Jesus, I would say that even if we had no records of his life at all we should still know from the existence of the early Christian Church, and the spirit which animated it that as its initiator there must have been a vast personal character and force. It takes a great man to do a great work. Appeals to fear and superstition and selfishness do not set up great loving unselfish work: they may make men strive to avoid punishment, or seek the favour of the gods, but they don't create anything better than themselves. Selfishness at the heart of a movement makes it selfish through and through. Superstitious fear at the heart of religion, makes it superstitious and cowardly. The joy, the love, the courage and self-sacrifice of the early Christians took their origin in a personality which had the power to call forth that joy, that love, that courage from the whole. Such a personality we find described for us especially in the first three Gospels; there we read words which still impress us as the simplest, truest expression of noble life we know. The more we dwell on these the more full of meaning they become, and the more real and beautiful grows the character of Christ. Amongst all conventionalities that which spoils for us the freshness and force of Christ's sayings is one of the saddest. We want to come to them free from prejudice, free from dull familiarity: then we shall know him for what he is, the greatest of human personalities, with power unweakened by the centuries, to help and heal the world.

Mr. Kristofer Janson's paper on the Unitarian movement in Scandinavia, contributed to the International Council meeting, and published in our present issue, is largely autobiographical in character, and interested readers will find some further particulars in the account of Janson, written some time ago by Mr. Theo Berg, of Copenhagen, a translation of which appears (as we noted last week) in the August New Kingdom. Janson was born in 1841 at Bergen, where his father was a merchant and American Consul. While teaching in a school at Gudbrandsdalen he was a neighbour of Björnson's, who pictured some traits of his character in Pastor Sang in his story, "Over Evne."

THE ENIGMA OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

What do we mean by the spiritual life? By changing the form of this question, we may take a view of it which will lead us to an answer. The spiritual life is the life where Ideals rule. What is an Ideal, and what is the significance of the fact that we are capable of forming them?

To have an Ideal is to reach out, in one direction or another, after something that is higher than our self—higher than our own highest possibilities—but which is more than a mere idea of something which might be. Dr. Martineau has said that "amid all the sickly talk about Ideals, which has become the common-place of our age, it is well to remember that so long as they are dreams of future possibility, and not faiths in present reality, so long as they are a mere self-painting of the yearning spirit, and not its personal surrender to immediate communion with Infinite Perfection, they have no more solidity or steadiness than floating air-bubbles glittering in the sunshine and broken by the passing wind. . . . The very gate of entrance to Religion, the moment of new birth, is the discovery that your gleaming Ideal is the everlasting Real—no transient brush of a fancied angel's wing, but the abiding presence and persuasion of the Soul of souls." Ideals are more than ideas, because they come home to us thus, with the force of something real.

In this general statement, we have really implied only that there is an actual present relation between the Divine and the human spirit. This relation is capable of various and conflicting interpretations; hence a careful intellectual analysis of the question may help by at least revealing the different possible beliefs which can be held. There is a natural prejudice against such an attempt; we feel as if we were simply beyond our depth in trying to analyse the deeper forms of the religious life, and that the result would not be productive of any real moral or spiritual good. But in thinking, there never is a "thus far, no farther." Once begun, we are impelled to think the matter out till the "bitter end"; or if we do come to a stop, it is only because Reason itself assures us that to go farther were irrational. Reason is itself "the master-light of all our seeing," and its demands are literally infinite.

We assume, then, that there is an actual present relation between the Infinite and the finite, between God and Man; for on this fact the possibility of the spiritual life depends. We must notice first of all what this admission excludes, before considering the various senses in which it may be accepted.

The idea which is excluded is one whose rapid decay is not much regretted by the thoughtful part of the community at present: that the Almighty Creator is far away on the margin of things, separate from the world and from us just as our finite individualities are separate from each other—a God sitting in state by Himself, never descending into the real world save to work special miracles at a single period of its history. The historical importance of this view scarcely need be mentioned; and it is interesting to note that one of the most popular religious effusions of the past two years has set forth the same idea in an extreme form—Anderson's "Silence of God." It is evident that, on such a supposition, the only possible access of the human spirit to the Divine would be by wonder-working rites or forms; by some unnatural process of re-birth or conversion; or by some mystical ecstasy in which the spirit is taken out of the real world. As we know, these logical results have been frequently worked out: the first by "high" ecclesiasticism and by Roman Catholicism, the second by the more extreme forms of evangelicalism, the third in Neo-Platonism and in some forms of Oriental religion which are not without their modern representatives.

If, therefore, Religion is, in any sense, to have a place in man's natural or normal life, we must assume a real connection between the spirit of man and God. And the great enigma of the spiritual life—the central problem in the Philosophy of Religion—lies in forming some clear conception of what this relation is. Fortunately, the problem is much simplified when we examine the various possibilities of meaning covered by the phrase, "a real connection between two real things." All the vast extent and multiplicity of relations which constitute the world of human thought and action, and the world of Nature, reduce themselves, by a little obvious reflection on our part, to a few fundamental forms or types. Practical proof of this is seen in the fact that the natural sciences may be classified so as to correspond with these types.

(a.) First come relations of things which are simply side by side, or before and after. "All the choir of heaven and furniture of the earth"—in Berkeley's words—so far as its changes are changes only of external arrangement, can be dealt with by the sciences of motion, Mechanics and Physics. These claim the whole material universe for their domain, and seek to explain all its relations as mechanical.

(b.) Next in order comes what is called chemical combination, which is different from even the finest "mechanical mixture."

(c.) Then, we have "organic connection," as in a living body, where the parts are "members one of another," and cannot be separated without losing all their character as living things. "An amputated hand is not even a hand."

(d.) Above this comes the unity of mind, by which the immense variety of thoughts and feelings which make up any one's consciousness are known to be parts of one and the same personal life. In self-consciousness the deepest differences are comprised within the most intense unity.

(e.) Lastly we place a form of relation which is probably the subject of more dispute than any other at the present day: the social union, which, as Dr. Martineau says, is "a concrete though spiritual form of life, penetrating and partly constituting all persons belonging to it; so that only as fractions of it do they become human integers themselves."

We have therefore distinct ideas of five different types of union; and four of them are currently and constantly employed—often in undistinguished confusion with each other—to explain the relation between the Infinite and the finite. Metaphors are often misleading; they are suggestive for poetic or hortatory purposes, but they cannot serve when our object is to understand. Hence such phrases as the "mingling" or "interpenetration" or "coalescence" of the Divine and human, or the "internal manifestation" or "inflowing" of the Divine in the human, must be set aside; for our present purpose they are useless, covering, as any one of them does, radically opposed ideas with equal facility. Abandoning metaphors, our problem takes this form: of these five natural types of union, which is the truest analogy of the connection between the Divine and the human?*

Let us compare the "mechanical" and the "organic" analogies. When two things are in merely mechanical relation, even if they are in closest contact, we may take one away without making any internal or essential difference to the other. They are divided existences; and the only difference made by the removal of one, is the removal of its outward contact with the other. If this is the true analogy, then God and man are separate beings, just as we are separate from each other. But if the Infinite Person is strictly other than the finite person, then the latter must be capable of existing as a self-contained, self-sufficient being, even if there were no Infinite Person. Then the only road to belief in anything higher than man is a logical road; by a process of argument we pass from the facts of human nature to the existence of God. And two of the most important of these inferences are extremely doubtful. Consider the one which is based on the fact of conscience. I may to any extent be conscious of imperfection and an obligation to be better, yet this surely does not warrant the assumption that another Person is perfect and has imposed that obligation on me. If man's soul is separate in existence from God, his moral consciousness, which is its crown and completion, is also separate in existence from God; and he would be capable of having that consciousness, even if there were nothing divine outside himself. And again, as regards the logical passage from our will as cause to the Divine Will as cause (creative cause): my will moves my arm, but I may will all day without being able to move anything beyond the reach of my arm; and surely this essential difference between the human will and the assumed Divine or Creative Will cannot be treated as unimportant.

What I have called the "organic analogy" is in harmony with that persistent instinct of Reason—never to rest in the assumption of divided existences, but to seek to connect things together into one. In fact, it is a well-established philosophical conclusion that the assumption of things which are separate existences and yet act upon one another is self-contradictory and therefore unthinkable. Leibniz and Herbart tried their hardest to work the assumption out, but their failure in this respect is universally admitted; and where they have failed, not many others are likely to succeed. The significance of the "organic analogy" may be partly grasped by considering the "cell-theory." Every tissue of a living body is made up of the same microscopic particles, called cells. In the body of man and of all other animals, they are the only actual independent factors of the life-process—the real, self-active citizens which, in combinations of millions, constitute the "cellular state," our body. Yet the living body is a unity; all its parts belong together and are "members one of another"; indeed, all the countless multitude of cells, which form its tissue, have sprung from one simple cell, the impregnated ovum, by continuous subdivision. Physical life consists of units which are parts of a real whole, while every one of them has a certain amount of real, independent existence of its own. Here we have an actual instance of things which are different without being separate; each has a distinct existence, yet all are vitally united. Applying this idea to the "enigma of the spiritual life," we may hold that God and Man are vitally united, without forgetting the difference between them. Each human soul draws continual energy from the Divine Life, and depends upon it as closely as each single "cell" depends on the physical life of the whole body; while at the same time it has a partly independent existence and some capacity of independent action. Indeed, if any one wished to work this analogy to death, he could not accomplish his purpose by arguing that it "mixes up" God and Man; but he might succeed by arguing that it suggests the possibility of an opposition between God and his creatures—an opposition so intense and real that the very notion of it would be abhorrent to many religious minds. For example, a group of cells may obstruct the life of the whole body, and, in the case of a morbid or malignant growth, may cause its death; and this obstruction is possible simply because the cells are not separate from the life of the whole. Are we prepared to maintain that men may thus obstruct, or frustrate, the designs of the Almighty on whom they are ever dependent? This result is not abhorrent to all religious thinkers; Dr. Martineau accepts it, and, for many, it is a necessary implication of religious experience. Whichever way this question may be decided, it is certain that to regard Man as a part of God (a "part" in the organic sense) does not prevent us from ascribing the extreme of independence to particular human actions.

How then do we stand? We have two analogies offered—the mechanical and the organic. The ethical and religious advantages claimed for the former (in making God and man separate beings) are fully provided for in the latter; and the intellectual difficulties of the former are avoided in the latter. This leaves us no choice.

The essential idea of the "organic analogy" is carried further in the "psychical analogy"—the fourth in our list. Here the unity and the difference are both more apparent. We find here a combination of the deepest differences, and sometimes oppositions—conflicts both of emotion and of thought—within the most intense unity. And here again there may be an obstruction of the whole by one of the parts. It is a common experience that at any time the general tendency of our desires and endeavours may be hindered by the persistent intrusion of other thoughts—thoughts that are sometimes worrying, sometimes simply irrelevant, but always useless and obstructive, and yet obviously part of ourselves. But we may accept the analogy in its general meaning without accepting this particular application of it. The point is that in real life and experience unity and difference are inseparable, and vital union is not inconsistent with extreme opposition. We may hold, with vigour and conviction, the view of the essential unity of God and man, while we recognise all the freedom and independence for man that could ever be desired, and more.

This view has also the great advantage of enabling us to explain and justify the fundamental aspect of every religious belief of the deeper and more vital sort—that it rests not on a process of argument, but on a direct experience which it tries to interpret. Mr. Armstrong has shown, in his beautiful chapter on "God revealed as Love" in "God and the Soul," how we may feel through Nature the reality of a Life, richer and fuller far than ours, but in vital kinship with it—not a separate existence as of another person. And in our Ideals, when the presence of something true, beautiful, or good lifts us above ourselves, the Ideal itself becomes no longer a dream of future possibility, but an experience of a present Reality; it becomes an apprehension of the indwelling God. The exacting obligation of a goodness which simply ought to be real, becomes a reverential aspiration after a Goodness which is real, and which is waiting with all the might of its Reality to flow gently into our spirit and strengthen our will. Even in sorrow of the most hopeless sort, God's relation to us is felt to be at once personal and far more—richer, fuller, and more comforting than any human personal relations can be.

Religious experience, when reasonably interpreted, does not seem even to suggest the mechanical view of the Infinite and the finite as two separate beings confronting one another. What is felt or experienced, in the proper sense, comes to us as an enlargement of our higher self. It comes, indeed, at the expense of the lower self—it comes only as the lower is subdued; but we lose our life to gain it. The higher aspects of our personal life are deepened and intensified, and we begin to know the unexplored heights and depths of the soul itself. We come in touch with the vital bonds that unite us to the Infinite. It is at once an enlargement of our higher life and self-revelation of the divine life.

S. H. Mellone.

* Analogy implies that there is a likeness in the relation of the parts to each other in the two things which are compared—as there is in mathematical "proportion."

"Nearer to God." Yes, it is not a mere religious sentiment, it is a fact of man's continual experience. It is salvation, it is blessedness; in it, and it alone, is found "the peace which passeth understanding," for to be nearer to God is to be higher uplifted above self and selfish cares and the manifold vexation of life. It is to enter into the vastness of His Eternity, and see and judge of all things as they therein appear, and as they truly are. And all good in us or of us—sorrow for wrong done, desire of better life, act of self-denying justice or charity—is God's drawing us nearer to Himself. For from Him, as the ancient collect says, "all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed," and of our own we have only impotence and darkness, His whatever of light and power we possess.—Charles Hargrove.

DR. MELLONE ON "MORAL RESPONSIBILITY."

Sir,—In the concluding paragraph of his letter referring to my remarks on his able article in Mind, Dr. Mellone disposes of the Free-will controversy after a summary fashion, which is now much in vogue among Absolute Idealists, but which, I believe, derives all its plausibility from an equivocal and very misleading use of the words "Moral Responsibility." This fallacy appears to me to be exercising such mischievous influence over current ethical and religious thought that I make bold to ask you to find, if possible, room for some comments on it.

Dr. Mellone says that in place of the words in his paper, which I criticised, he ought to have written: "Upon the fact of Moral Responsibility all but materialists are agreed." Now, if precisely the same sentiment of Moral Responsibility were equally compatible, on the one hand, with the Libertarian theory, which declares that our past moral decisions in seasons of temptation could have been different from what they really were, and, on the other hand, with the theory of the Absolute Idealists, which declares that every moral decision which a man makes in the course of his life was, under the circumstances, the only possible one, then it is evident that the Free-will controversy would have little ethical or religious interest; for on either hypothesis we should have philosophical justification for the sentiments of moral obligation, of self-condemnation and remorse, and for the expression of moral praise or blame. If both theories led to the same ethical goal, it would be morally indifferent which side we took, for on either road we should reach, as Dr. Mellone says, "all that is required by Religion, Morality, or the Common Sense of the race at large"; and so in this case Dr. Martineau might as well have omitted his hundred and thirty closely-reasoned pages on the subject, nor need Professor William James have written his brilliant and forcible paper on "The Dilemma of Determinism."

But I venture to maintain that the Common Sense must be of a very low order if it does not, on a little reflection, clearly see through the fallacy which underlies this use of the words "Moral Responsibility." "Moral Responsibility" in the mouth of an Absolute Idealist means that man in his actions expresses his character, and as a rational being may be so influenced by reasons and motives as to act more wisely in the future than he has done in the past; while in the mouth of a Libertarian a man is said to be Morally Responsible for a past bad decision only when it is believed that it was in his power at the time to have chosen a nobler possible alternative, and he is morally responsible for his own particular character only to the extent in which he has possessed and exercised a power of free option in the formation or modification of that character. I feel no hesitation in asserting that the meaning which "the Common Sense of the race at large" assigns to these words is the latter one.

If a minister of religion were to inculcate upon his congregation the doctrine that not one past act or thought of any one of them during his or her whole life could possibly have been other than it really was, and were then to tell them that some of their acts had been noble and praiseworthy, while others had been mean and blameworthy, and that it was his solemn duty to impress upon them that they were morally responsible for each one of them, I have little doubt that he would find that the Common Sense of the congregation would rise up in revolt, and would assert that if his first doctrine be true, then they would in future decline to hold themselves responsible for the Sins of which their consciences used to accuse them, but which in the light of the New Psychology, with its novel doctrine of the Self, they now clearly perceive to be, strictly-speaking, no Sins at all, but simply inevitable and, from the human point of view, somewhat ugly phases in man's necessary mental and moral evolution.

If I mistake not, Common Sense would be quite in agreement with the following statement by Dr. Martineau:—"When I judge my own act, I feel sure that it is mine, and that not in the sense that its antecedents were in my character, so that nothing could prevent its coming, but in the sense that I might have betaken myself to a different act at the critical moment when the pleadings were over, and only the verdict remained"; and if it could be proved that this possibility of turning at the critical moment to another alternative does not really exist, then, as the same writer elsewhere observes, moral responsibility, in the ordinary sense of these words, must be regarded as a delusive dream. As to the effect upon the minds of others I cannot, of course, speak with confidence, but for myself I feel sure that if once I were firmly convinced of the truth either of the coarser determinism of the materialists or of the subtler determinism which is now more common, my ethical and religious sentiments would undergo a vital change, and I should quite expect that in my case, as in that of Spinoza, such sentiments as those of Repentance and Remorse, being seen to be utterly irrational, would gradually fade away and disappear.

Before concluding, I may mention that there is one sentence in Dr. Mellone's letter, the meaning and relevancy of which I am entirely unable to perceive. He says, "I am still guilty of refusing to regard the doctrine of Free Will as an infallible dogma, maintained by a small body of 'the elect,' and never to be questioned." Surely Dr. Mellone is just as much entitled to question the accuracy of mine, or anybody else's, belief in the Freedom of the Will, as I am to question the correctness of his doctrine of the Self; and it cannot be doubted that a friendly discussion of these important subjects is likely to be helpful to both of us in our common search for truth. As regards numbers, it is certainly true that in the purely philosophical, as distinguished from the religious sphere, the believers in the Freedom of the Will, though including several of the ablest leaders of thought, are at present, owing to special scientific and intellectual tendencies now dominant, a comparatively "small body." But what can Dr. Mellone mean by calling them—I suppose, sarcastically—"the elect"! Judging from the very contemptuous estimate of them often expressed by prominent determinist thinkers, of whom Mr. F. H. Bradley may be taken as a sample, it would be vastly more appropriate to say of libertarian opinions, if not of the holders of them, that at the present time they are decidedly "the tabooed." I am also hopelessly perplexed when I try to gather from the expressions in Dr. Mellone's letter what is his real attitude towards the question of Free Will. A man must believe either that it was possible for him in some of the moral crises of his life to have decided otherwise than he did decide, or that it was not possible; there is no conceivable middle course. LITERATURE.

DR. ABBOTT'S "CLUE."*

We can only speak of this work with great diffidence. It is an attempt to show that portions of the Synoptic Gospels are derived from a Hebrew original, and to explain some of their divergencies as corruptions or misunderstandings of a common source. Great labour has been expended on the task, and we cannot resist the conviction that most of this labour has been in vain. The restorations of a supposed Hebrew original are often, to say the least, precarious and even fanciful, and Dr. Abbott's familiarity with Hebrew is scarcely, as we think, on a level with his undoubted qualifications as a Greek scholar. It is, for example, simply incredible that "bthzih" (we adopt Dr. Abbott's transliteration) could ever occur in ordinary Hebrew prose to signify "desert," and could thereby be confused by St. Luke with "bthzidh"—i.e., Bethsaida. The explanations given on this method never appear to rise above a low degree of probability. Even if they could be made good, the supposed restorations of the original are not very important or very interesting. It is also unfortunate that any attempt should be made to render these matters plain to readers who are unable to read Greek or Hebrew. Such persons, we venture to say, will not and cannot follow the reasoning in the book before us. On the other hand, students who have some knowledge of the Bible in the original would much prefer to have the Hebrew text of each passage in the Synoptics set before them, wherever Dr. Abbott believes that he can restore that text. After this the deflections in Hebrew and in the exegesis and translation of the Hebrew should have been given step by step.

The work before us is but the first of elaborate studies which are to follow on the "triple tradition," the "double tradition" the matter proper to individual evangelists. Those who have read Dr. Abbott's article on the Gospels in the "Biblical Encyclopædia" will have a general idea of his method and results.

SHORT NOTICES.

Brother Musicians is an account of the late Edward and Walter Bache (sons of the Rev. Samuel Bache, of Birmingham), the former a successful composer, of refined and elegant style, the latter well known as the dauntless and long the sole champion in England of Liszt's music. The two lives together cover a transitional period of unusual interest in the history of modern music, embracing as it does Mendelssohn, Schumann, and the so-called "Music of the Future," leading up to Liszt and Wagner.

Upon the expression "Music of the Future," which during the career of both brothers was generally used in a depreciatory sense, a striking comment was made some twenty years ago by Walter Bache, to the effect that the greatest Musician of the Future had already appeared more than a century before, in the person of Johann Sebastian Bach (1685-1750). The originality of this happy remark seems clearly to attest alike the soundness of his training, the refinement of his taste, the perspicuity of his judgment, and the comprehensiveness of his views. In his early days in London Edward Bache was organist of All Saints' Church, in Gordon-square; and somewhere about twenty years later Walter Bache was organist of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. The book contains several photographs, one hitherto unpublished letter of Liszt's, and many interesting reminiscences that have come within the personal knowledge of the authoress, Miss Constance Bache. Among the illustrations is one of the memorial window to Edward Bache, who died in 1858. It was thirty years later, in 1888, that his younger brother passed away. (Methuen and Co. 6s. net.)

The Place of Compensation in Temperance Reform, by C. P. Sanger, M.A. One opens a book bearing the above title with the hope of reading something which will help to clear away the greatest obstacle to thorough Temperance reform. Before the recent Royal Commission, the representatives of the Alliance and the C.E.T.S. pleaded against any compensation; while from the other side came a plea for full compensation. Anyone who could bring the two parties nearer together would be a public benefactor, and one goes to Mr. Sanger eager to see what he can do. The result is not exhilaration. The book has its useful points. It discusses the meaning of "vested interests," and shows that this phrase is neither the absolute stronghold nor the mere pretence which the respective extremists hold it to be. There is also a convenient summary of the precedents both for compensation and for non-compensation. But the examination of opposed principles is brief; the arguments for the principles adopted are feebly and vaguely expressed. One gathers that Mr. Sanger is for full compensation in normal instances, but one feels little hope that he will convince a single Alliance man. And he will certainly convince no publican when he qualifies his principle thus (but without the italics, of course):—"To the extent, then, that the value of a license is enhanced by the fact that the profits are made from drunkenness, it is not unreasonable to refuse to compensate. . . . In any case where it was proved that a drunken man had been served, the licensee is certainly not entitled to much consideration, and it would be well that he should receive no compensation" (p. 117). We knew before that nothing yields nothing, but, according to Mr. Sanger, something may in this instance be equally unfruitful. It would not be fair to say that the above is an average sample of the book's contents; it is an extreme example of a general limpness in the argumentative parts. (P. S. King and Son. 2s. 6d. net).

Arthur Laurenson: His Letters and Literary Remains, edited by Catherine Spence. A glimpse into the life of a real man is always interesting; but when he is a Shetlander and is a loving student of the old Norse myths and songs, it is also refreshing. Arthur Laurenson was a Lerwick merchant, who not only took an active part in the public life of his native town, but also interested himself in the ancient literature and other remains of the northern peoples, and contributed essays and translations to journals. The influence of such men is precious in their circle, and naturally their friends wish to preserve the memory of it amongst themselves, and, if possible, to extend it amongst others. Probably the former of these purposes will be well fulfilled by the above memoirs, but of the latter it is impossible to speak hopefully. The matter of the book is not of sufficient weight for ordinary publication in book form. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

BYRON'S "CAIN."

BY THE REV. H. SHAEN SOLLY, M.A.*

WHEN Lord Byron called his drama Cain a mystery, he wished his readers to be reminded of the early mystery plays which dealt with Biblical subjects in days before the Bible was translated into English. But, in truth, his object is almost diametrically opposite to that of the writers and performers of the old English miracle and mystery plays. Their aim was to show in the streets a living Bible, to teach the people what the Church considered the most important events of Scripture history. These were days when the clergy and the religious-minded laity of England worked together with a harmony never known since. There was no more shadow of ridicule connected with the performances here than there is now connected with those at Ober-Ammergau. Only after the translation of the Bible, when the people could read it for themselves, did these plays in England lose their raison d'être, and cease to represent the popular teaching desired by earnest and orthodox religion.

Lord Byron, on the other hand, represents the revolt against the popular orthodoxy of his time, and he makes use of a Bible story in order to utter the strongest protest against a religion taught in the name of the Bible; I do not say, taught in the Bible, for a great deal has been read into the Bible narrative since Milton wrote "Paradise Lost." But, in order to appreciate Cain, we must know what was the popular orthodoxy of the end of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and understand how largely our own emancipation from it is due to the great poets who derived their inspiration from the impulses of the Revolution. We may do this without any denominational jealousies. Certainly I can claim for the Unitarians of 100 years ago—prior to Channing—no distinguishing disposition to welcome, still less to originate, the new ideas which are now so much a matter of course. They were very literal, somewhat narrow, Scriptarians. It is, as Stopford Brooke has told us, the poets whom we have been and are now studying—Blake, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Byron, Keats, and Shelley, with one other whom we have not yet touched, Burns—who were the early Prophets of the new theology which the close of the nineteenth century hands on to the twentieth as an acquisition at least equal in value to its scientific discoveries.

All that was best in Lord Byron's strangely mingled nature revolted against the teaching that God created Adam and Eve, placed them in Paradise, allowed them to be tempted, and then punished all their descendants for the trivial fault committed by our first parents. Byron expresses his feelings in two ways—first, in the truths which he puts in the mouth of Lucifer; secondly, and still more, by making Cain incomparably the finest man in the drama. Of course, Adah's is a very beautiful female character, but Cain is a far more manly nature, is far more of a man, than Adam or Abel. Byron wishes to show what would be the effect of treatment such as that described in Genesis upon a manly character, and he depicts it as producing a murderer, a fratricide, with whom we cannot help feeling the deepest sympathy.

Some of the sentiments put in the mouths of Cain and Lucifer have a special interest for me as I have long been familiar with them as the principal stock-in-trade of modern Secularists, and it is noteworthy to find them so forcibly expressed by Byron in 1821. Great offence was caused, not so much by Byron putting such sentiments in the mouths of Cain and Lucifer, as by his letting such characters obviously have the best of the argument. The question for us is whether Byron could have refuted these arguments without deserting the premises alone supplied by the orthodoxy of the time, or having recourse to sophistical reasoning.

I am not as well acquainted as I could wish to be with the popular theology of the period and speak under correction, but the impression derived from what I do know is that this theology does lead logically to modern Secularism. The revolt of the late Charles Bradlaugh from all religion, or the Agnosticism of the late Professor Huxley, seem to me only too legitimate consequences of the possession of right feeling and the exercise of sound reasoning on the bases of these theological premises. And, most assuredly, it was the poets who were the Prophets of the new Reformation, while the Churches lagged sadly in the rear.

Let me now briefly indicate a few quotations which seem to me to justify the view I am taking.

At the beginning of the play Cain denies that life, under the conditions imposed, is something for which to be thankful. He lives in constant dread of this unknown Death, and reproaches his parent with not having plucked the fruit of the tree of life. Orthodoxy, in the person of Adam, tells him not to blaspheme, and Cain retorts—

> Why not?
> The snake spoke truth: it was the tree of knowledge;
> It was the tree of life: knowledge is good,
> And life is good; and how can both be evil?

To this Eve answers that such speech is sin, and tells Cain "Content thee with what is." This is exactly the spirit of Pope's miserably shallow optimism—

> One truth is clear: whatever is, is right.

* A Paper read before the Bridport Reading and Discussion Society.

Cain is left to his own meditations, and asks these questions:

And this is Life!—Toil! and wherefore should I toil?—because
My father could not keep his place in Eden.
What had I done in this? I was unborn:
I sought not to be born; nor love the state
To which that birth has brought me. Why did he Yield to the serpent and the woman? or,
Yielding, why suffer? What was there in this?
The tree was planted, and why not for him?
If not, why place him near it, where it grew,
The fairest in the centre? They have but
One answer to all questions, "'Twas his will,
And he is good." How know I that? Because
He is all-powerful, must all-good, too, follow?
I judge but by the fruits—and they are bitter—
Which I must feed on for a fault not mine.

In connection with this passage let us call to mind the appalling misery which oppressed the masses of the European poor at the beginning of the nineteenth century, misery which was plainly due to wars and tyrannies which were not their fault. And I fear that the only answer given by "older and wiser people" to the questions asked by young hearts was the solemn reproof given by Adam and Eve to Cain.

Such unanswered questions naturally lead to the entrance of Lucifer, an Angel of Light—a fallen Angel—but as magnificent a creature as Milton's Satan, and, as a Devil, or real spirit of Evil, incomparably inferior to Goethe's Mephistophiles. Indeed, Byron had no wish to represent Light and knowledge answering the honest spirit of inquiry, as essentially evil. Mephistophiles is the incarnate sneer, the true blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; but "Of Lucifer," says Bishop Heber, "as drawn by Lord Byron, we absolutely know no evil." He reveals to Cain the immortality of the soul, and then in somewhat veiled language indicates the eternal misery of Souls who dare use their immortality—

The rest of this speech of Lucifer's is audacity itself; but again it is for us to ask, could it have been answered by the theology of the day? Answered, of course it was, but I believe only by shallow and sophistical reasoning.

Byron does not seem to me to press unfairly the Biblical narrative. He is perfectly right in representing Eve as tempted by a serpent, not by Satan; and, later on, he does his best to meet two of the stock Secularist objections—namely, Who was Cain's wife, and how can he have been afraid of himself being met by any man and killed? We may not altogether admire the solution he gives us, but it would be difficult to suggest a better without borrowing some of the discoveries of modern scholarship which to Byron's critics would have seemed worse blasphemy than his own.

The following seem to me characteristic lines:

My father is
Tamed down; my mother has forgot the mind
Which made her thirst for knowledge at the risk
Of an eternal curse.

Robert Hall, the Eclectic Reviewer of Cain, sagely remarks: "Curiosity has ruined greater numbers than any other passion; and as, in its incipient actings, it is the most dangerous foe of innocence, so when it is become a passion, it is only fed by guilt." Compare the utterance of Dr. Johnson, the manliest man of the eighteenth century:

A generous and elevated mind is distinguished by nothing more certainly than by an eminent degree of curiosity. This passion is, perhaps, regularly heightened in proportion as the powers of the mind are elevated and enlarged. Curiosity is the thirst of the soul; it inflames and torments us, and makes taste everything with joy, however otherwise insipid, with which it may be quenched.

Adah's remonstrances with Cain are extremely beautiful, and show all that can be said by the natural instincts of a loving, pious nature; but they answer none of Cain's questions, and we should still be barbarians, and probably fetish-worshippers, had they always been allowed to silence such questions. While the speech of Cain beginning "My little Enoch" was believed to express orthodox truth, there was, indeed, need for free inquiry alike in the interests of science and true religion.

One of the touches of human nature which take us straight to souls such as Byron's own is Cain's craving for sympathy. This he finds only in his new friend, the spirit of Light, in Lucifer; how is he to know that such a spirit is evil? What is there to decide when faith is a virtue and doubt is a sin? The Church has often answered this question wrongly; did she decide it rightly at the time when Byron wrote?

I must pass briefly over the Second Act. Byron could have written that better if he had known all that modern science has taught us. But it contains some fine poetical passages. The description of the voyage through space is far superior to anything that Milton has written on the same subject. Lucifer's boast that he does not require faith as a condition of salvation is curiously like the position of the modern scientist, and the general impression given of Death and Hades as the end to which life and all creation lead is very powerful. Even Cain's love for Adah rests on her perishable beauty, though he shrinks from admitting this. Most noteworthy is the line in which Lucifer tells Cain why he speaks to him about Abel.

Because thou hast thought of this ere now.

Here is Envy, a real manifestation of evil; and because Cain had allowed it entrance into his heart, the Evil Spirit can reenforce the temptation. Starting from this point, Cain might have learnt something of truth concerning good and evil, truth admirably set forth by Bishop Butler. But did the orthodoxy of Byron's time pay much attention to Bishop Butler? The words of Lucifer, concluding the Act are one more protest against the tendency of a mistaken orthodoxy to stigmatise truth as evil.

The Third Act gives us the worthy climax of a great drama. Here there is not much theology. Byron gives us another beautiful scene between Cain and Adah, suggesting that Cain, left to natural affection, would be kind and gentle. It is Abel's determination to make him religious which brings about the catastrophe. Apart from this, Byron seems to me simply trying to work out his plot in accordance with true dramatic art. How could the murder come about? He tries to show, reducing the crime to manslaughter, but not attempting to justify or palliate it further. Cain's attack on Abel's altar is an act of wanton aggression, due to envy, due to passionate anger, aroused by the rejection of his offering and the acceptance of Abel's. Cain's previous invocation of the Deity is highly characteristic, especially the line where he says of himself:

He is—such as Thou mad'st him.

This, all through, is Byron's excuse for Cain, forcing on us the problem of free will which Dr. Johnson had done as much as any man can do to solve, but which the critics of Byron's drama mostly preferred to leave untouched.

When the deed is done, when the long dreaded death is really introduced into the world, then Byron's magnificent genius appears in full strength, and describes what is felt by Cain and his accusers with a force which is perhaps unsurpassed in dramatic art. Cain realises the curse that is upon him, and that is for him to hand on to the human race; and let no one be ashamed of feeling sympathy with Cain, and the profoundest pity for his fate. Contrast the shrill cursing of Eve with the noble language and the undying love of Adah. Byron achieves what he set out with the intention of doing, to arraign the theology which taught this story of the Fall and its consequences as divine truth.

Further than this Byron does not attempt to go. We could not expect it in this particular drama, and we might read through all his works without feeling that he himself answers satisfactorily the questions that he asks. Byron is no special favourite of mine; but, most assuredly, in his own time he was blamed much more severely for some of the best things that he did than he was for some of the worst; and it is for us now to seek to restore the balance of a true judgment. Granted that much of his best work was only pulling down, he wrote at a time when pulling down was needed. We may fairly compare his work with that of Burns in the latter's contest with the Scotch Presbyterianism of his day; and, as a writer, I do not think Byron comes off second best, though, as a man, I greatly prefer Burns.

Byron wrote Cain in hot haste, evidently with a feeling of flinging defiance to the world. Had the world been in a different mood, Byron might have felt less aggressive, and written with less offence. But what I plead for here is that we should judge his work by the circumstances of his own time.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Birkenhead.—On Sunday morning last Mr. John Fretwell, of Providence, R.I., gave an interesting address on the events which led up to the departure of the Pilgrim Fathers. Mr. Fretwell has come over to this country and the Continent in pursuit of materials for the history of the Pilgrim Fathers, upon which he is at present engaged.

Carrickfergus (Reopening).—The non-subscribing church at Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, which has been closed for some years, is to be reopened on Sunday evening, Aug. 25, at seven o'clock, when the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, will preach on "The Ideal of a Christian Church." The handsome little meeting-house, which enjoys an ideal situation immediately facing Belfast Lough, has for some years been looking gloomy and deserted; but now it looks quite resplendent in two coats of paint. Inside, comfort and artistic effect have been secured by the introduction of modern heating and lighting arrangements, and a liberal application of distemper, paint, and varnish. We understand that it has been arranged that the Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, shall take charge of the congregation at Carrickfergus, and preach there on the fourth Sunday evening in each month, while the Rev. W. G. Marsden, of Ballycarry, will preach on the second Sunday evening in the month; and the choir of Ballycarry Unitarian Church have kindly promised their aid. There is a good train service to Carrickfergus, and it is hoped many Unitarians who live within easy distance will make a point of attending these two Sunday evening services in the month, and that general and hearty support will be accorded to this earnest and well-planned effort to keep the flag of Liberal Christianity flying at Carrickfergus. Mr. James Logan, who is also a trustee, is chairman of the congregation, and Mr. W. Larmour is the hon. sec.

Chelmsford.—On Sunday morning, the 18th, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Lupton, of Leeds, were present at morning service, and on being requested to conduct the evening service, Mr. Lupton kindly consented, and gave an excellent address on the great need of a more practical application of the teachings of Jesus in view of the present war spirit.

Colwyn Bay.—The Rev. J. C. Street having concluded two Sundays' services at the Pavilion here on Aug. 11 (when about 110 were present), the Rev. W. G. Tarrant took the first of his two services on Sunday last, when between ninety and a hundred attended. There was a ready response to the invitation to take our literature, and the offertory was decidedly liberal. Musical aid by friends in the neighbourhood would be much appreciated. The series closes Sept. 1, when the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst will conduct the service.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—A memorial window to the late Rev. Charles Beard has been placed by the members of the congregation in Ullet-road Church. It is the window next to the chancel on the left side of the nave as one enters the church, and is well seen from the reading desk. Like the other memorial windows in the chancel, it is by the William Morris Company, from designs by the late Sir E. Burne-Jones, and contains three symbolic figures, representing the prophet Isaiah, with Enoch and Elijah on either hand. Below is the following inscription:—"To the Glory of God and in memory of the Rev. Charles Beard, LL.D., minister of Renshaw-street Chapel, from 1867 to 1888." The window was seen in its place for the first time last Sunday, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, who in the absence of the Rev. Dr. Klein, was taking the services, made the following reference to the memorial. At the close of the morning sermon on "Life with God," he said:—"I am glad that I am allowed to speak to you of these things to-day, when there is one special memory vividly recalled to those who in the past have been intimately associated with the life of this congregation. For fifty years it was the privilege of this congregation to have in the succession of its ministry two men whose word was with living power, with rare insight into the things of the spirit, seers of the truth of God, in lowly Christian discipleship, who made other men see and led them into ways of faithful service. They two being dead yet speak to us, and, happily, in the wisdom and inspiration of their books, speak to the world. The central window in the chancel of this church is a memorial to John Hamilton Thom, for thirty years minister in Renshaw-street Chapel, a teacher revered and beloved, who still interprets for us the Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ; and to-day, for the first time, we see another window in memory of Charles Beard, a window placed here by the congregation to whom he ministered with such matchless eloquence, making clear to them 'the Soul's Way to God,' and the ways of faithful service in His Kingdom here on earth. Such memories are a priceless treasure, fruitful of present help and inspiration, for which we must indeed give thanks to the Giver of all Good."

A PERPETUAL calm will never make a sailor. Self-denial is good for the character; it is the path of life.—Dr. Schofield.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE published on Aug. 17 the Peace Manifesto agreed upon by a meeting of Free Church ministers at the Memorial Hall, under the leadership of Dr. Clifford, and extensively signed. Another manifesto, much shorter and simpler, and free from all marks of compromise in the drafting, was published on Monday, sent to the press by the Rev. A. E. T. Newman, vicar of Granborough, Winslow. It bore the signatures of twenty-four clergymen of the Church of England, one Roman Catholic, and eighty Nonconformist ministers. Among the latter we notice the names of the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. Page Hopps, W. J. Jupp, T. Lloyd Jones, H. D. Roberts, A. E. O'Connor and C. E. Oliver. The list was badly printed, and there may be other names of our ministers, which we have overlooked or misread. The manifesto is as follows:—

We, the undersigned ministers of Christ, believing it to be our duty to interpret the Christian Faith, declare:

1. That it is Righteousness, and not Territory, which exalteth a nation.

2. That the same moral law is binding on nations as on individuals.

3. That a war of conquest is contrary to the principles taught us by our Master, Christ.

We ask, therefore, for His sake, who came to heal the broken-hearted, and to proclaim liberty to the captives, that terms, penetrated with His spirit of peace, goodwill, and charity, be offered to the Boers, which they may accept without loss of self-respect.

Signatures may be sent to the Rev. A. E. T. Newman at Granborough Vicarage.

THE annual Wesleyan Pastoral, addressed by the Conference to the Methodist Societies, records with thankfulness the £920,000 promised towards the Million Guinea Twentieth Century Fund. It refers to the testing of the Bible by modern criticism, and affirms that what is essential has come out of the furnace unscathed. "Our New Testament has been given back to us, loosed from the thongs of tradition in which it had been bound, and made ready for wider service and for more confident appeal by the witness of the fire to its proof." In face of the dreadful harvest of materialism, the fruits of which are seen in growing luxury and craving for wealth and pleasure, the degradation of conscience and the darkening of spiritual vision, while the influence of superstition and priestcraft grows, the appeal is made for more devoted service in preaching the gospel. The gospel of experience, which is pre-eminently the gospel of Methodists, is what this age most sorely needs; and this must be preached with a true simplicity of manner and life. May this appeal be brought home not to Methodists alone!

THE National Conference of American Unitarian Churches is to meet this year at Saratoga, Sept. 23-26, under the presidency of the Hon. George F. Hoar. On Monday evening, Sept. 23, the sermon is to be preached by the Rev. C. E. St. John, secretary of the A.U.A., and then follow three full days of work. On Tuesday morning, after several addresses, the Revs. Horatio Stebbins and Edward Everett Hale are to introduce a discussion on "Retrospect and Prospect." In the afternoon the biennial meeting of the Woman's National Alliance is to be held, and in the evening follow addresses on "The Church at Work" and "The Church at Worship." On Wednesday morning the Revs. M. J. Savage and J. H. Ecob are to speak on "The Gospel for the Twentieth Century," and the Rev. W. C. Gannett on "The Minister's Adjustment to new Conditions." At subsequent sessions a large place is occupied by social questions, e.g., "Settlement Methods," "The Church and the Unchurched," "The Organisation of Labour," "Trusts; or, the Centralisation of Power." The Sunday School Society, the Temperance Society, and the Young People's Religious Union also have their meetings during the week.

A FIRST number of the British Sanitarian, a journal of Hygiene and Bacteriology, edited by M. Wynter Blyth, B.A., B.Sc. (Pleydell House, Pleydell-street, Fleet-street, E.C., 3d. monthly, by post 4d.), issued this month, leads us to look with interest for the second number, and to wish for the new journal a useful and prosperous career. In this first number Mr. Lawson Dodd, M.R.C.S., deals with "An Aspect of the Housing Problem," noting the vital interest of the question and the growing demand that it shall be effectually dealt with. Modern sanitation has done a great deal to make life in towns among the industrial classes tolerably healthy, but it is done at great cost, and much remains undone because of the cost. And one result of what has been accomplished has been a great increase in rent.

For those who could pay it, it has brought conditions of life of a greatly improved character, shown by the lowering of the death rates of women and children, especially in the decades after 1875, the year of the great Public Health Act; and in the great decrease in mortality from phthisis, typhoid fever, cholera, and other diseases shown during the latter half of the nineteenth century. But for those who could not pay it has meant gross overcrowding, which is the rough and ready way the very poor have adopted, of dividing the extra cost into portions equal, or approximating to, the old rentals.

In a second article Mr. Lawson Dodd, who has had practical experience in grappling with these evils, proposes to consider them in further detail, and how they have been effectively met. Another worker at this great problem, Mr. Ebenezer Howard, also contributes the first of a series of articles on "Garden Cities: the best Solution of the Housing Question."

To the Daily News of Aug. 22 Professor Goldwin Smith contributed an article on "The Bible and War," and in defence of the Old Testament. He first rebuts a charge of Professor G. A. Smith's, who in a recent volume on "Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament" had referred to him as having "ignorantly judged" that the Old Testament was a millstone round the neck of Christianity. His actual statement was that "belief in the historical character of the earlier books of the Bible" had been the millstone. Having then pointed out that his critic was himself responsible for no less radical criticisms of the Bible, Goldwin Smith proceeds:—

No sane man would regard the Old Testament in its entirety as a millstone, or refuse to recognise its sublimities, its beauties, and the service which parts of it have rendered to moral civilisation. Indeed, it has suffered some injustice at the hands of its orthodox devotees. Militarism is misapplying it at this moment. A Jingo Church dignitary, flattering the prevailing passion for war, appeals to whole books of the Old Testament which, he says, "ring with the clash of conquest." If he listens to certain books of the Old Testament, he may hear not only the clash of conflict, but the shrieks of men, women, and children of a captured town indiscriminately butchered, and the groans of the whole population of conquered cities tortured under harrows of iron or passed through the brick-kiln. But the ideal Hebrew polity (Deut. xx. 1-9) is not militarist; it is very much the reverse. I may repeat what I said on this subject many years ago, when the Old Testament was cited in defence of American slavery.

War was the universal state of nations in early times; and the strong, though coarse, foundations of human character were laid in the qualities of the warrior. The Jews were always surrounded and always threatened by war. Therefore to fight valiantly for his country and his Temple was part not only of the civil duty, but of the moral training of a Jew, and to be with the people in the hour of battle and exhort them to behave bravely was part of the office of the priest, and consistent with the character of his calling.

On the other hand, there is no exaltation of war above other callings, or of the military character above all other characters, such as we find in Greece, at Rome, and in the other heathen nations. There is none of that false estimate of moral qualities which produced the institutions of Sparta, and which partly leads Plato, in his ideal republic, to propose that woman shall be trained to take part equally with man in the work of war. There are no provisions for triumphs or other military rewards; no incentives to military ambition; no rules for military education. No heaven is opened, as in the Koran, to those who fight bravely for the true God. "Peace in all your borders" is the blessing, though war is not a crime.

The God of the Hebrews, then, is not characteristically "a God of Battles." Compared with the gods of the other nations, He is a God of Peace. Yet He has been taken for a God of Battles, as well as for a God of Slavery, and his name has been invoked in unjust and fanatical wars.

Christian Churches, therefore, in pandering to the lust of war, apostatise not only from the principles of the New, but from those of the Old Testament.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE address delivered to the students of Manchester College by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, as Visitor, at the close of the session last June, reported at the time in these columns, has now been published (Rawson and Co., Manchester). After speaking of the enlightened views on education consistently maintained from the first by the supporters of the College, and their fidelity to its fundamental principle of Free Teaching and Free Learning in Theology, Mr. Steinthal recalled an earlier public examination in the following interesting passage, which we are glad to be able to reproduce here in full:—

So far my retrospect shows no change in collegiate practice, and I have only had to rejoice in conservative faithfulness to religious liberty; but when I come to speak of the administration of the College I can show great changes. Yesterday you occupied four hours in reading essays, sermons, &c., and in the evening we united in the solemn Valedictory Service in which two of your number bade farewell to their collegiate life, and were welcomed into the brotherhood of the Christian ministry. Eighty-eight years ago, on June 29 and 30 and July 1, 1813, your predecessors went through a very different ordeal. Let me read to you an extract from the Monthly Repository of July, 1813 (Vol. VIII., No. 91):—

"On Tuesday afternoon, the several classes were examined in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, and the Targums; the second mathematical class in spherical trigonometry, conic sections, and the higher branches of algebra, and the third in fluxions, the doctrine of chances, and the principle of life annuities, also the junior Latin class, and the second class of Modern History, the first or Ancient History being omitted for want of time";—as the time allotted was only five hours, this want is easily recognised. "On Wednesday the students were examined in Hebrew, poetry, ethics, the evidences of natural and revealed religion, and the philosophy of the human mind; and the junior classes in Greek. Orations were also delivered in the course of the day by Mr. Mardon, on 'The Natural Evidence for a Future State'; by Mr. John Strutt, on 'The Moral Efficacy of the Study of History'; by Mr. Philips, on 'The History of Charles I.'; by Mr. Harrison, on 'The Peopling of America'; by Mr. Douglas Strutt, on 'The Effects of the Discovery of Gunpowder'; by Mr. Wallace, on 'The Knowledge Epictetus and Antoninus might Probably Derive from Christianity'; by Mr. Howse, 'To Show that the Apostles were not Enthusiasts'; by Mr. Bakewell, 'That Natural Religion does not Exclude the Necessity of Revelation'; by Mr. Brettell, on 'The Character, Offices, and Qualifications of the Christian Preacher'; and by Mr. Jevons, on 'The Existence of Evil.' On Thursday, besides the junior class of mathematics, the class of Natural Philosophy, and the higher Latin and Greek classes, in which are several excellent scholars, the students of the fourth year underwent a very long and highly satisfactory examination on the sources and rules of Biblical criticism, with various practical illustrations on the several books of the Old Testament, their ages, objects, contents, the Jewish law, &c. The students of the fifth year were afterwards examined in like manner on the New Testament; but, from mere want of time, this examination could not be extended to so great a length. The examinations were diversified by the occasional introduction of discourses by Mr. Ashton, on 'The Mosaic Institutions'; by Mr. Holland, on 'The Political Character of the Jewish Prophets, in answer to Morgan'; and by Mr. Hincks, on 'The Question whether a Future State be taught in the Old Testament'; of Latin Orations by Mr. Jevons, Mr. Peene, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Smith; of Dissertations by Mr. Robinson, on 'The Authenticity of the Ancient Persian Records, and their Discrepancy with the Greek Historians'; and by Mr. Smith, on 'The Origin and Progress of the Greek Comedy'; and of Sermons by Mr. George Kenrick, Mr. Henry Turner, and Mr. Hutton."

Hearing these long lists of subjects in which the students were examined, and the not short list of diversifications, you will not be surprised to learn that on each of these two days nine hours were devoted to the task. The minute book records the presence of twenty-four gentlemen at the examination, of whom seventeen were laymen. It does not state whether they were present all through the proceedings, but the "Repository" adds a remark to show the reality of the testing of the students' knowledge, as it says: "The principle originally laid down was strictly adhered to, not one of the students being previously apprised of a single question to be asked, or passage to be referred to, nor one of the discourses (the subjects all chosen by the students) having undergone the revisal or correction of any of the tutors." It is gratifying to find a memorandum in the Minutes of the Trustees' meeting held by these untiring men, after nine hours of examination on Thursday, that a resolution was unanimously adopted, "That the examination which has closed this day has been, in the highest degree, satisfactory." You will not need any remark from me to make you see what a change has taken place in our methods of conducting our proceedings at the close of our sessional proceedings, from old days. But I must mention one incident of the examination which shows that one of our difficulties has been perennial. A study of the Minute books tells us that complaints were made from the early days of the College on the subject of Elocution. To stimulate attention to this matter, a special prize was offered, and the Rev. William Turner, of Newcastle, the visitor, was happy in being able to observe a very general improvement in the manner of the students' delivery, and hoped that there never would be any further opportunity of animadverting on any deficiency in this respect. The Trustees had one little excitement allowed them in the arduous duties which fell to their lot in the examination, as the recipient of the prize for Elocution was elected by them at the close of the public examination. We still are as anxious as were our predecessors to find the students of Manchester College able to do justice to their acquirements by so clear and distinct an enunciation, that they may be heard and understood by their hearers. Pardon me if I venture to urge upon you the importance of this only too frequently neglected art, and to assure you that no one can fail in acquiring it, if he will devote due time and diligence in practice. May I be allowed to speak one word on this subject from my own personal experience? I think I may say that, whether I am able when speaking to say anything worth hearing or not, I am able to make myself heard wherever I do speak. And yet, when I mentioned to my father my desire to become a minister, his first remark was that it was useless for me to think of such a thing, as I had so indistinct and thick an utterance that no one would ever understand me if I addressed them from the pulpit. I spent a good amount of time in correcting this fault, and believe I have overcome it; and I feel convinced that anyone, who recognises the value of clear enunciation and distinct articulation, can, by persevering patience, acquire this faculty. In one respect speaking and writing are similar. You will all be aware that it is not difficult to read a manuscript from which all the vowels are omitted, while one with the consonants left out is illegible. Take care in speaking to make the consonants distinct, and you may rely upon it you will be heard, whatever happens to the vowels.

EVERY desire is a prayer; every aspiration a step towards that to which one aspires. We build or destroy our ideals by each thought, by every hope or fear, by every effort or retreat.—Dresser.

CHURCH AND STATE IN AMERICA.

BY THE REV. CHARLES W. WENDTE, OF BOSTON, U.S.A.*

THERE are two institutions in human society whose adjustment of their mutual relations has been the source of more agitation and strife than any other known in history. They are the State and the Church. The story of European civilisation for the past eighteen centuries is largely a record of the struggle between the religious and the political interest. In the New World we are exceptionally and fortunately circumstanced in this respect. Our young civilisation is comparatively free from the traditions and tyrannies of a past order of society, while the great preponderance of Protestants in the United States, constituting as they do seven-eighths of our population, secures practical unity of sentiment among us. This unity is imperilled only by open or covert attacks upon the American system of Church and State by the Roman Catholic clergy, and the unreasonable demands made upon our National and State Governments by certain unenlightened and ultra-Protestants for a specific recognition of their religious opinions in the constitution and laws of the land.

The former are a constant menace to the peace and integrity of the Republic. The latter are fortunately few in number. and not at all likely to attain their ends.

It is to show that the true interests of both the religious and political order are best subserved by the separation of these two great institutions in human society, the Church and the State, and the complete secularisation of the latter, that I proceed to inquire: What are the ideal relations which, under a Republican form of Government at least, should exist between the Church and the State, and in how far does our American system fulfil them?

In theory there are three principal relations which may exist between the civil and the ecclesiastical interest.

The Theocratic System.

The first is that of the supremacy of the Church, and the subordination of the State. This is called Theocracy. The classical example is the system of the Papacy and the canon law of the Roman Catholic Church. Since the time of Gregory the Seventh the Roman Church has taught that there can be no sovereign political authority, nor any independence for the individual, beyond the limits fixed by the ecclesiastical power.

The State has, indeed, a qualified independence within its sphere; but what that sphere is is determined by the Church, which thus becomes the ultimate authority in all civil and political concerns. To quote the language of an American Roman Catholic Bishop: "The State is for the body, the Church is for the soul. But the soul is superior to the body. Hence the Church is above the State." This reasoning is supported by appeals to the Scriptures, to tradition, and to other recognised sources of religious authority. The Church having thus the divine right to rule, it follows that its head, the Pope, is the sovereign of the world, and all civil governments are subject to his primacy.

Such, in substance, is the Roman Catholic or Theocratic Doctrine of Church and State. True, in common practice the Church has often modified her demands. She has been compelled by the logic of necessity to recognise and treat with civil governments as equals. In the many earthly dilemmas in which the Church has found herself, she has, from motives of self-preservation, kept her extreme theories somewhat in abeyance and accepted the situation with the best grace possible. But the doctrine of ecclesiastical supremacy was not surrendered thereby. It was only suspended and kept in reserve, to be again advanced at a more favourable opportunity.

The Theocratic Doctrine, then, is that Church and State should be united, that the Church should, in case of any difference or conflict with the civil power, be superior to it, and the State be subordinated to the Church. It may be believed by some that this doctrine has had its day, and is not likely to reappear again in modern society. But our own generation has seen it developed to a speculative extreme in the dogma of Papal infallibility, a dogma the Church did not dare to advance at the height of her power in Mediæval times.

It is highly improbable that in a thinking and scientific age, and amid the free political institutions of modern Europe and America, the Roman Catholic theory will ever again become the basis of any new order of society. But though it may have little creative power left, it still exerts a great disturbing influence throughout the world. European nations, almost without exception, to-day are rent with discords and struggles which have their source in the political pretensions and worldly aims of the Roman Catholic Church. Even in the United States this Theocratic theory exercises a disturbing influence, prompting those who hold it to open or secret hostility against the principles and institutions which are the strength and glory of our New World civilisation, liberty of conscience and of worship, free schools, a free press, and a free State.

One Head of Church and State.

It will be worth while, therefore, to examine the nature and merits of the opposite or American theory of Church and State. Before doing so, it is necessary to refer briefly to a second legal relation which may exist between the civil and the ecclesiastical power—namely, a union of Church and State under one head. The most perfect example now existing of this system we find in Russia, where the Emperor is also the spiritual head of the Greek Church. In a modified form this theory underlies the Established or State Church of England, and, in a still more modified form, the Privileged Evangelical Church of Germany, whose head, the Emperor, governs through a council or synod whose members he himself appoints. I cannot dwell on this system; nor is it necessary, for it is already on the wane, and may be considered as only an intermediate step between the Theocracy of Rome and that entire separation of the Church from the State which is the characteristic doctrine of the American Republic.

The American System.

I. Let us examine this American theory more closely. The State we may define roughly as social man organised for the purpose of civil government. The Church is social man organised for worship and religious nurture. Thus, in theory, each of these great agencies has its own peculiar functions, and is assigned a distinct sphere for their exercise. Each is to respect the other's right, and not to interfere with the other's operations. This is the theoretical, the ideal, conception of the relations between Church and State, and this is generally conceived to be the American view on this subject.

But this is a very partial view of their mutual relations, and by no means the one which actually obtains in American society. There cannot be any such entire separation and yet co-existence of those two powers. In their practical working, Church and State continually interfere with each other, and it is often very difficult to say what is the sphere of each. For example, the Church represents the spiritual interest, but she has temporal possessions which bring her within the laws and ordinances of the State. To be sure, the Church strenuously denies that the State has any right to interfere with her property arrangements, no matter how they affect the welfare of the community. This is what the Roman Catholic Church says to-day to the American State, as she heaps up millions on millions of property, usually exempt from taxation, held absolutely by one person, the Bishop, and by him only as the representative of a foreign ruler, the Pope; thus forming a continuous and dangerous monopoly in our midst. The American State may sooner or later have to interfere to regulate this great and growing evil, as the Governments of Europe have had to regulate it, but the moment she attempts to do so, the cry of the Church will be, "Hands off! You are transcending your sphere!" The question then arises who is to determine what is the respective sphere of the Church and the State? "The Church," answer our Catholic authorities. But then, on this supposition the Church might accomplish any end, no matter how worldly or injurious to the community, by simply declaring it to be a spiritual necessity, and the State would be compelled to submit. Thus the Second National Council of the Roman Catholic Church at Baltimore, in 1866, declared that "in prescribing anything contrary to the divine law" (i.e., as interpreted by the Hierarchy) "the civil power transcends its authority, and has no claim on the obedience of the citizen." Now our American principle of self-government teaches us the contrary, and tells us that the Church should not only be separated from the State, but in all temporal concerns be subordinated to it. Based upon the idea of the Sovereign Power of the people, the State, as the expression of that Sovereignty, is the highest competent authority in American life. It follows, then, that the State cannot allow another power alongside of it vested with superior or even equal right, and absolutely independent of its authority. The State is the supreme power in the land, and whatever individual or institution disobeys its laws and opposes the public interest and will, must give way. To be sure, the State allows its citizens a large measure of individual liberty. It grants certain definite privileges to the family, and to other associations of men, for specific purposes. But only so far as these do not oppose the public will and welfare. Among others, the Church enjoys a certain independence in administering her temporal affairs, but whenever she oversteps the limits of her freedom, and acts against the general good, or does anything to abridge the civil rights of the members of her communion, then the State has a right to interfere and make her superior authority felt. On the other hand, in the sphere of purely speculative and spiritual interests the Church is sovereign and absolutely free. Here the State confesses its limitations and leaves the spiritual prerogatives of the Church unchallenged and unquestioned.

This, then, is the true American doctrine—in spiritual concerns the absolute independence of the Church; in temporal affairs the subordination of the Church to the State.

No Established Church.

II. Another leading and characteristic feature of the American system remains to be spoken of. The American State does not know the Church, or a church even, but only churches.

In most European countries, side by side with the Government, there is usually an Established Church, whose institutions are closely interwoven with the thought and life of the people. This being so, the Government cannot but recognise her claims and make the best possible terms with her. In the United States the situation is very different. There exists among us no Established Church, but only a large number of scattered sects of greater or less pretension. The Roman Catholic Church, comprising one-eighth of our population, is only a rival sect among the rest. These churches hold widely divergent views; each thinks itself right and the others more or less in the wrong; each claims to be the Church. No one among them is sufficiently powerful to overshadow the others. As a matter of simple justice and necessity, therefore, the American State can recognise no one church but only churches. Presbyterian and Unitarian, Protestant and Catholic, Jew and Christian, the Mormon in Utah the Buddhist in San Francisco, are all alike recognised, and receive the same impartial treatment. The State does not investigate or decide concerning their conflicting claims to divine truth and right. It does not discriminate in favour of or against any of them. It does not even know them in their religious, but only in their private and corporate capacity. Their spiritual or traditional origin it has nothing to do with. It deals with them just as it would deal with a college, a benevolent society, a railroad corporation, or a bank. They exist under the laws of the State, receive its protection, and are subject to its conditions. With their internal administration the State will have nothing to do. It permits them to make such regulations for their own government as they please, be these Papal, Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Congregational in form. Concerning this it does not inquire. It only demands, first, that the various churches shall not, by overstepping their own canon law, abridge the ecclesiastical rights of their members; second, that no church shall enforce decrees which affect the civil rights of the citizen; and, third, that the teaching and practice of any church shall not contravene the laws of natural morality or injuriously affect the public order and welfare. But unless they do thus conflict with its laws the State leaves them in peace to work out their own salvation. The Rev. T. B. Forbush, in his discussion of this subject, says:—"In the eye of the State the churches are organisations for specific ends. Their statutes or charter define those ends. Beyond dealing justly with them, and insisting that they shall deal justly with one another, she has no obligation and should assume none."

The Result in American Life.

Such is the general understanding in American society concerning the relation between the civil and the ecclesiastical power. Under this system our young nation has enjoyed a degreee of political and religious liberty such as no other country can equal, and which has made us, in large degree, the prosperous and powerful people we are to-day. Under this system religion itself has increased, both in the purity of its contents and the scope of its influence. I venture to assert that there is more vital religion in the United States to-day than in any other country. This is chiefly owing to the benign influence of that secular State which it is the fashion in certain circles to denounce as "godless" and "profane."

The enlightened faith and political sagacity of the founders of the American Republic, and its fortunate exemption from the traditions and tyrannies which still retard the progress of many of the nations of the Old World, have made possible this improved relation between Church and State in America. We do not deny that it may have some disadvantages, but we believe they are outweighed by the positive merits and beneficial results of our system. To maintain it and hand it down unimpaired to posterity is our sacred privilege and duty. While we do not presume to decide what is the best system of Church and State for other peoples, differently circumstanced from our own, we commend the American plan to their candid and careful consideration, in the belief that only as they approximate to it can they realise that ideal of a free Church in a free State, that union of pure religion and perfect liberty, which it is the aim of this Council to promote, and which is at once the dream of the thinker, the patriot, and the free believer.

FAITH.

The following cluster of helpful and suggestive thoughts has been gathered from an "Essay on Faith" by the Rev. W. Robbins, D.D., published last year by Messrs. Longmans and Co.

The soul face to face with God, this is the foundation of the spiritual life, the attitude and the atmosphere of a living faith.

If faith cannot formulate the idea of God in consistent and exhaustive statement, no more can science the idea of matter.

Speculative doubts cannot be driven from the field once for all.

Finite terms cannot compass infinite truth. Better the reverence which dare not formulate lest it derogate from truth's dignity, than the shallow self-assurance which would sound the depths of eternity with the plummet of a glib metaphysical statement.

A man cannot be unworldly one day in the week, and worldly the other six.

Spiritual certitudes multiply in strength and sweetness as a man walks humbly with God.

Worldly standards of success, the parish viewed as a business venture, sermons as the subject of critical comment, ritual as ministering solely to an æsthetic taste—this is verily the transformation of the Church into the World.

While the intellect is elaborating moral ideals, faith does the righteous deed.

Freedom's throne is abdicated when the soul suffers itself to be played upon by every impulse of the phenomenal world.

Through the door of faith God floods the soul with life and light.

How to make life strong and beautiful and free, this is the question which presses more insistently for an answer than any other.

Logically faith must precede works; practically they are coincident.

Each soul must make its own discoveries; the deep things of the spirit cannot be learned from hearsay.

Liberty is freedom to do the right, not whatever we please.

At best dogma is the imperfect utterance of children, face to face with truths too mighty for their comprehension.

"Christ made everything which he touched beautiful, then I will do the same by the power of his spirit"—this is faith in Christ.

Men agonise in their search for God, and all the time He is with them, pleading for recognition in the simplest facts of life.

The spiritual faculties, holding loftier place in the hierarchy of the soul's powers than the intellectual, need more careful and painstaking training, and they receive far less.

Faith is an idealist and an agitator—restless with the eagerness of discovery. Words will not satisfy it, it starves on phrases, it must find God. And this finding of God is the most startlingly original experience in the whole range of human endeavour. It never grows old, it never falls into hard and fast lines, it never exactly reproduces itself.

It is unquestionably harder to live the spiritual life than to do religious works. Hence there is always danger of men making shift to substitute Work for Life.

To preserve the freshness of our faculties, to look on the world with the unspoiled eyes of children, to be inspired with an enthusiasm that no routine can dull, to claim every truth as ours by the inalienable right of Divine sonship—this is the goal of a true moral culture, the independence of the spirit.

Take hold of the first thing that offers itself for you to do: work in the fields, saw wood, at the desk, wash dishes, tend behind the counter, or whatever it may be: be faithful to the thing in hand, always expecting something better, and know that this in hand is the thing that will open to you the next higher, and this the next, and the next.—R. W. Trine.

THE JEWISH ENCYCLOPEDIA.

In this age of encyclopedias it is not surprising that one should be devoted to the Jews. The part which they have played in history, the immense significance of their contributions to religion, their wide-spread dispersion at the present day, all mark them out as specially distinguished among the races of men. Much of their activity has remained in the obscurity which shrouded them during the long passion following the final overthrow of their religious polity, and their permanent exile from their ancestral homes. The modern spirit of inquiry has consequently been busy with them as with other remote forms of human thought and life, and has brought to light a vast quantity of important information belonging to the underground currents of speculation and feeling, when the Jew was as different as possible from the typical form conjured up by the modern Anti-Semite, directing commerce, controlling the Press, manipulating politics, and stimulating international rivalries, for the sake of his own gain. Every student of the New Testament now knows the importance of Talmudic lore; and the historian of philosophy finds the Jews of Spain a necessary link in the transmission of that Aristotelian learning which was to naturalise itself in the Catholic Church, and prepare the way for the great awakening of the fifteenth century.

It was a happy idea, therefore, to gather up the results of modern inquiry into the history and literature of Israel. The first volume of the Jewish Encyclopedia recently issued by Messrs. Funk and Wagnalls* opens this great enterprise. It extends from Aach to Apocalyptic Literature, contains 685 double-columned pages, and is adorned with numerous illustrations.

The whole scheme embraces twelve such volumes. The work is under the charge of an editorial board of twelve members, including names well known on this side of the Atlantic as well as in the United States, such as Professors Toy (of Harvard), Morris Jastrow, jr. (Philadelphia), and Mr. Joseph Jacobs of this country. A larger band of more than forty consulting editors, American and European, are in the back-ground, among them being scholars like the Master of St. John's, Cambridge, Dr. Oort of Leiden, as well as some of the most distinguished continental Jewish savants. Further still the list of contributors to the present volume shows that help has been derived from Budde, Buhl, Conybeare, Schürer, Stave, and others whose writings are familiar to all students; while the byways of Jewish history have been ransacked by those specially qualified for these remoter investigations. The range of subjects is amazing; the biographies begin with Adam and go down to the rabbi, the journalist, the sculptor, the opera-singer, even the pugilist (does he belong to "civilisation" or to "sociology"? see preliminary synopsis), in the nineteenth century.

The interest and value of such a publication, of course, lie in what is really special and peculiar to it. Thus, the Biblical articles are necessarily of very mixed content. They often combine contributions by more than one writer. For instance, under Adam and Abraham there are four sections, each by a different scholar, dealing successively with the Biblical data, the allusions in apocryphal and Rabbinical literature, the Mohammedan legends, and the critical view. This method often secures a greater completeness; on the other hand, in the dual article on "Angelology" (one portion by Dr. Kohler, of New York, and the other by Dr. Blau, of Budapest) there is a good deal of overlapping. A comparison of this article with those on the same topic in Hamburger's Real Encyclopädie für Bibel und Talmud and in the Encyclopædia Biblica will show both the strength and the weakness of this new dictionary. The handling of the Scriptures is often deficient in precision and delicacy; the stores of extra-Biblical learning are abundant. Still it must be fully recognised that the object and basis of the work provide a perfectly free field for the expression of opinion—witness Dr. Toy's "critical view" of Abraham: where questions are still under debate, the arguments on both sides are carefully stated, as in the article on "Ancestor Worship," by Mr. Joseph Jacobs. Tradition is naturally dominant with some of the less advanced writers; thus we meet with the statement (under "Anthropomorphism," p. 622) that the men of the Great Synagogue "undertook to establish a sacred canon" which no "modern" scholar would justify; but the whole spirit of the articles is large, liberal, and candid.

Much attention has been paid to the traces of Jewish thought and influence in Christian writers, whether it be Aphraates or Ambrose in the fourth century, or Alexander of Hales in the thirteenth. Another rich field of Jewish lore is that of apocalypse and eschatology, which ought not to be left only to Christian scholars. The articles on the book of Adam, the Apocalypse and the Testament of Abraham, on Antichrist, and on neo-Hebraic Apocalyptic literature, show how much can be done in this direction by those who are well acquainted with the folk-lore embodied in the Talmud and the Midrashim. Mediæval philosophy gets abundant recognition in the lives of some of the great Spanish teachers, though of course Maimonides has yet to come. And lastly, modern Judaism is presented in various aspects; geographically and socially, for example, in America; as begetting a great philanthropic experiment in agricultural colonies; as working for emancipation and moral progress in Alliance Israélite Universelle; as the object of bitter and unscrupulous hostility in Ante-Semitism.

This colossal scheme has only been rendered possible by an immense amount of co-operation — co-operation between publishers, editors, and contributors, and last, but certainly not least, the co-operation of nearly seven thousand subscribers, without whose aid the enterprise could not have been begun. It is to be hoped that their courage and faith will be rewarded by the completion of the twelve volumes to which the work is expected to extend.

INDIVIDUALISM AND COLLECTIVISM.*

Mr. Kelly has duly followed up his first volume on "Justice" by a second on "Individualism and Collectivism." He shares the feeling of many a thoughtful American observer that the present reign of Individualism is wrong, and that the evils of pauperism, prostitution, and crime will never be seriously checked until it is replaced by a new system of State-directed industry. The strife of competition and the tyranny of the market have done the good that they are capable of doing, and for further progress we must adopt a higher organisation and a more religious force. Mr. Kelly shows how modern civilisation has secured personal liberty, or freedom from unjust imprisonment. Theoretically, it has secured political liberty, or freedom from unjust and corrupt government; but, practically, this freedom is most imperfect, owing to political corruption, and the facts he quotes under this head from the political life of the United States are as grievous as they are impressive. There is a third form of freedom—economic liberty—and this, for a very large proportion of the inhabitants of a civilised country, does not exist at all; and its tendency under present conditions is rather towards limitation than increase. In this way Mr. Kelly tries to meet the usual objection that Collectivism is antagonistic to freedom. He gives reasons for believing that when the acts of a Government more closely concern the obvious welfare of the people, the citizens will take more pains to secure honest and efficient government, so that there will be a large increase in political freedom.

As for economic freedom, every man would be required to do three or four hours service a day to the State, but the rest of his time would be completely at his own disposal.

These facts and arguments are mostly familiar. Perhaps what is now required is an explanation why they have not produced greater practical effect. Why have they not made more converts, say, towards nationalising the railways and the collieries? Probably the true answer is that we dread putting such an enormous increase of power into the hands of government. The great extension of Trusts in the United States and the establishment of their huge, and, on the whole, well managed, monopolies makes the adoption of Collectivism comparatively easy, but it is just there that Municipalities are most corrupt and least to be trusted. The most interesting part of Mr. Kelly's argument is that which is directed towards showing that permanent municipal reform would follow the enlargement of the powers of local authorities. What is certain is that the municipalities which are actually doing the work of honestly supplying cheap gas and pure water, who are running trams at reasonable fares and treating humanely their employés, and who are helping to solve the problem of the housing of the working classes, are those who are practically doing most to promote the higher and more Christian organisation of Society.

SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES: AN APPEAL.

Sir,—Although we may have to wait some time yet for the establishment of civilian rule in the Transvaal and Orange River districts, Lord Milner's return to South Africa is likely to be followed before long by the making of detailed arrangements for it which, after they are made, it may be difficult to alter. I therefore trust that you will allow me, on behalf of the Aborigines Protection Society, to appeal through your columns to the religious organisations throughout this country, which can do so much in guiding public opinion and influencing the authorities, for co-operation in efforts to secure, as part of the contemplated arrangements, adequate provision for equitable treatment of the natives in this portion of South Africa.

The issues now at stake, it is submitted, are far more worthy of consideration than questions still freely and angrily discussed as to the amount of blame attaching to the Boers in their dealings with the natives. They differ from these and other questions incident to the war, moreover, in that all humane persons may be expected to be in substantial agreement about them. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the war in its origin, and of the conquest now in process, and however culpable has been the native policy of the Boers, the result aimed at is conversion of the overthrown Republics into a British possession as profitable to its owners as "law and order" can make it, and the most ardent Imperialists, no less than "pro-Boers," should be anxious to rescue from present injustice, and save from further injury, the people of whose right to "philanthropic and kindly and improving treatment" Lord Salisbury has admitted that "we have been too forgetful." The obligation is strongest, indeed, upon those who think with Mr. Chamberlain that "the treatment of the natives of the Transvaal has been disgraceful, it has been brutal, it has been unworthy of a civilised Power," and who, with him, find warrant for the war in the duty of reversing that treatment.

The natives immediately affected probably number more than a million. About three-fourths of them are in the outlying districts of the Transvaal, on the north and east, and have in recent years been but little interfered with except when they were raided upon for hut-tax or dispossessed of land wanted for white men's use. Perhaps not more than a sixth have settled on the Boer farms, cultivating their own gardens or tending their own cattle, when not rendering service in lieu of rent. The rest are employed in the towns, by Outlanders as well as by Boers; and a few were included among the 70,000 or 80,000 labourers in the gold mines before the war broke out, though the bulk of these came from Cape Colony, Natal, Zululand, and Portuguese territory. To this 800,000 or so must be added some 60,000 Swazis, very much interfered with under the "protection" of the Transvaal Government, and the better treated natives in the Orange River district, estimated at about 150,000.

The Boer policy towards natives, however much it may have been modified of late, is notoriously degrading in theory and often cruel in practice, and worse on the north of the Vaal than on the south. It denies that there is any equality of rights between blacks and whites, and exposes the former to legalised as well as, under tyrannical masters, to illegal hardships. As a matter of fact, however, and with some glaring exceptions, the Boers have dealt more leniently than Cape Colonists and new comers from Europe with the great majority of the natives outside their actual purview and, as a rule, have been kindlier masters to those, comparatively few, employed as servants in their farms and houses. Passlaws, apprenticeship, deprivation of landed property, and other oppressions notwithstanding, the Transvaal and yet more the Orange River native not aspiring to be his own master has generally had more practical freedom and chances of prosperity than his kinsman in Natal or Cape Colony. All the special and oppressive legislation introduced in the Transvaal since 1884 has been at the bidding of the Outlanders, and avowedly designed for the advantage of the mine-owners and other wealth seekers who began to crowd into the country as soon as the Rand was opened up in 1885.

We feel, therefore, that we are justified in appealing to "the Churches" for active support in urging on the Government the duty of so ordering affairs in the territory it has taken under its control that the interests of the black inhabitants shall be as well cared for and promoted as those of the whites; and, if that is to be done, we submit that observance of the following conditions is essential:—

1. Demarcation of the Zontpansberg, Lydenburg and adjacent parts of the Transvaal, now almost exclusively occupied by an enormous coloured population, as a Native Reserve in which, following the admirable precedent of Basutoland, the residents shall be protected in the maintenance of their tribal institutions, saved from the intrusion of fraudalent traders and other mischief-makers, only interfered with by the officials set over them in respect of offences too grave to be dealt with by their own methods, and only taxed to the limited extent necessary for defraying the expenses incurred in an administration manifestly and solely conducing to their well-being.

2. Adoption of a similar policy in Swaziland, with variations rendered expedient or unavoidable by the pernicious influences to which its unfortunate inhabitants have been exposed throughout the past twenty years.

3. Considerable alteration of the Pass Law, Squatters Law and other legislation by the Transvaal Republic which is still in force, affecting the status of natives resident in farms and towns, with a view of securing for them certainly not less (and in some particulars, more) civil rights than are accorded to those natives in Cape Colony who are in the employment of or association with Europeans.

4. Such control over the relations between capital and labour as will remove all risk of their resulting in any form of slavery.

This last is the matter of gravest present importance, and one that, though as regards the self-governing colonies not much can be done here to regulate it, calls for careful watching in other parts of British South Africa, as well as in the Transvaal. The Glen Grey Act and other measures of the Cape Government, designed to unfairly favour capitalists' interests in the Kimberley diamond-fields and elsewhere, are, in accordance with bolder projects, for the "exploitation" of labour for the profit of Rhodesian as well as of Transvaal gold-mining and other enterprises. The capitalists make no secret of their desire to coerce the natives into supplying them with plenty of cheap labour, and specious talk about the advantage of familiarising savages with "the dignity of labour," and so forth, is offered in excuse of schemes for converting the machinery of government into an organisation for the collection and management of all compulsory service that the employers require. In Rhodesia the futile and disastrous attempts of the Chartered Company to practically enslave its inhabitants are being followed by alarming experiments in the importation of labour from other parts of Africa, and even from Asia. Like projects are openly advocated for the Transvaal, and, if they are sanctioned, they can scarcely fail to increase greatly the misfortunes of the bulk of its population which has thus far had partial immunity from white men's oppression, and to involve in the persecution victims from more distant areas beguiled or coerced into virtual slavery in the Rand and other gold mines. The Gold Fields Pass Law, adopted by the British Government since it took charge of the Transvaal, with a few modifications lessening the flogging penalties, but in other respects more oppressive than the superseded law that the Boer Government passed in 1895, under pressure from the Outlanders, illustrates the danger now to be faced.

This danger is far more comprehensive and deplorable than most people in this country appear to be aware of. Unless it is averted, all our pretensions of humanity towards South African natives as a warrant for the war will be proved to be hypocritical, and all our professions of national detestation of slavery will be falsified. It can be averted if Christian Englishmen will give voice to what surely are their convictions, forcibly enough and promptly enough to have influence with the Government and its representatives in South Africa before the arrangements that are now being elaborated have been concluded and made law.

Thankful in their uphill fight for the smallest mercies, Temperance reformers try to be glad that the Children's Bill passed the House of Lords on the last day of the session, and is added to the Statute Book in the form in which it came from the Grand Committee. It is true that the heart had been torn out of the measure as introduced by Mr. Crombie. The age (which in the United States and Canada is twenty-one) was reduced from sixteen to fourteen, and the word "knowingly," which was introduced, will afford abundant opportunity for evasion of the law; but the worst is that according to the new measure children of any age may be sent to the public-house to fetch drink, if only it is delivered to them in corked and sealed bottles. The gain is that they can no longer have it supplied to them in jugs or cups, and are thus saved from the danger of sipping by the way. The law of 1872, which forbids the selling of spirits to persons under sixteen for their own consumption, happily remains unrepealed.

OBITUARY.

MR. WALTER MAWER, F.G.S.

Readers of The Inquirer in former years will have observed with regret the notice in last week's issue of the death, on the 17th inst., of Mr. Walter Mawer, who from 1879 to July, 1886, was publisher of this journal, and whose contributions to its columns exhibited the qualities of an acute and well-informed mind. Mr. Mawer also acted as publishing agent for the Sunday School Association in the days when its offices were located in Norfolk-street, and one or two useful volumes of his own were added to that Society's list. His mind always took a scientific turn, and while his views in theology were of what is regarded as a radical type, his delight in imparting elementary knowledge of natural objects was keen and unflagging. His studies led him finally to enter the medical profession, for which he qualified somewhat late in life at St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

Mr. Mawer at one time was well-known as a lay-preacher, and he took an active part in the formation of the congregation at Wood Green. Subsequently he left London, settling in the country, and was connected with the Ipswich congregation till the time of his death.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "The Soul's Way to God," by the Rev. Charles Beard.

I am supposing the case of one who deeply feels in his own heart and conscience the weight of Christ's spiritual asseverations. There is much in them which he feels to be indefinitely above himself, and yet not out of harmony with himself: a high tone of confidence, where he could speak with but a stammering tongue; a clear insight of the soul, where his imperfect faith could only grope with outstretched hand. His heart goes forth to meet these words of life: his conscience finds in them the secret of strength and insight: the labyrinth of existence seems to open out before him as he walks by their guidance. Does he need any further authentication of them? Is there any sign yet wanting by which he may recognise a Son of God? Surely, if there be, he may find it in the calm and touching beauty of the life which the Gospels reveal to us. I know that the record is imperfect; that the Christ of the Synoptics and the Christ of John are hard to combine in one harmonious conception: the picture is like the image of the sky reflected in wind-swept waters, a broken beauty, of which now this aspect and now that presents itself to view. I know that critics have found fault with this word and that action, as preserved in the New Testament, and I have tried to bring an impartial moral judgment to the estimate of their accusations. I confess that, even without making allowance for mistaken interpretation and imperfect record, I think that never did so much ingenuity accomplish so little; for me, when all cavillers have done their worst, the character of Christ shines forth still without spot or tarnish. When I take counsel of my own conscience, when I notice the almost universal love and veneration of men; when I add to this the strange force still inherent in that sacred memory, so that Christ, "being lifted up, hath yet power to draw all men up to Him"—I cannot help feeling that I am in the presence of a moral and religious phenomenon of a quite exceptional kind, and that in this Galilean Prophet humanity makes its nearest approach to God. If this, or any large part of this, be true; if the life and character of Jesus have this distinctness and naturalness, and yet stand out so high above the common walk and conversation of men, will you attempt to persuade me next that it answers to no reality? that in its divine unity and harmony and beauty it is the chance product of legendary accretion, the accidental sum of Christian hopes and desires, during the first century and a-half after the poor young Prophet met his death upon the cross? Or is it, perhaps, a mere mythical shadow of old Jewish hope and expectation, projected upon the cloudy atmosphere of that wild imperial time? Do you know of any other growth of fable, any other birth of fiction, so fair? Are we to say that the highest moral flood-mark of humanity was attained, not by any strong and fair Son of God battling with temptation and reaching forward to perfectness in the flesh, but by a fancy sketch, proceeding from no single brain, of a life that was never lived? Nay, to me, there is a profound naturalness in Christ; and I begin to understand him when I find in him the highest exemplification of a universal law of the spiritual world. The word and the life—these are at one: what is the life, but the unuttered word; and what the word, but the spoken life? The word of God upon any man's lips, with power—that means, in its degree, the life of God animating the prophet's heart. There can be nothing more completely in accordance with God's law than that he who spake as never man spake, should also live as never man lived.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Last week, you may remember, we were inspecting a Roman Camp, and this week we have another camp to examine, though, as you will find, one of a very different character. I wonder how many of you have ever seen a "Gullery"? I, for one, had not, till a few weeks ago; and I then found it so interesting that you perhaps will like to hear about it.

Please transport yourself in fancy to a shingly beach on the Cumberland coast, where a narrow neck of sea divides us from what appears to be a small island, perhaps a quarter of a mile out to sea. As a matter of fact, it is a long sandy peninsula, and not an island at all; but the best way of approach is by means of a boat.

In the last whitewashed cottage of this seaside village we find our boatman, who speedily rows us to the "Gullery," and tells us where we are most likely to find the nests. We are at least a month too late to see it at its best, for many—indeed, far the greater number of birds have hatched out and are away; but we shall still see a fair number, and be able to judge from the nests how numerous the eggs and young birds we should have found had we made our call, say a month or six weeks earlier.

Having left our kindly old boatman—with particular instructions not to forget us and make Robinson Crusoes of us—we pick our way through the wet sand and shingle, and gain the low marsh and sand-hills beyond. Here we spread out, and soon an exulting shout announces "a nest!" We hurry to the spot and there sure enough are three eggs, but the only "nest" is a slight hollow scooped in the ground, and nothing more. Soon we find another nest, then another, and shortly quite a little colony of them, all much alike, save that some have a trifle of moss or a few blades of dry grass as a lining.

Whilst we are exploring, a perfect cloud of gulls are hovering overhead, and, if sound goes for anything, are objecting most strongly to our proceedings. I am very deficient in bird-lore, but can easily pick out at least three descriptions of birds flying above and around us. The biggest and most noticeable are the "oyster-catchers," large, heavy-looking birds, with blackish head and shoulders, red legs and very conspicuous orange-coloured bill—and a truly formidable "bill" it is when presented, as any unfortunate oyster or mussel finds out.

Next we notice the black-headed gull, whose name pretty well describes him, and with him I was familiar, having seen many of them in the fields in spring, picking and working away, much as you will have seen rooks do in inland counties. Last and least were the "terns" or "sea swallows," beautiful little birds that you often see flying about with great speed, sometimes just topping the waves as they dart and skim about. It was the "nests" of these latter birds, the "tern," that we had so far discovered, and now we came across some of their young—such pretty, fluffy, downy little mites, of a browny yellow colour, and looking very like chickens. As a rule, the wee things squatted close to the ground and remained motionless when they saw we were observing them. Indeed, they looked so helpless that one of our party picked up a little chap, thinking he was damaged in some way, but when put down, Master Tern ran so fast and so far that we could not help laughing, particularly when we gazed on the puzzled face of the "picker up" as he watched the "invalid's" flight.

We now walked over a number of sand-hills where we had been told the larger gulls built, and though we found but few eggs, for the reason I have already named, we found hundreds and hundreds of nests on the ground. In places they were so numerous and so close together that one could not have avoided treading on them, and so destroying either eggs or young birds, had they still been there.

Time was now up, and we made our way back, and in response to our signal the old boatman once more put out and soon ferried us to the main land again, whilst we bombarded him with questions about gulls and eggs and nests.

CHRISTIAN DISCIPLESHIP.

IN what sense can it be said that we come to GOD through CHRIST? What is meant, when it is said that he is for us "a mediatorial mind"? These are questions which we have asked of our own greatest teachers, turning once more, and with never failing interest, to Dr. MARTINEAU's sermons, and especially to those two sermons on "Christ, the Divine Word," which seem to promise the most direct answer to our questions, and to the sermons of his friend and brother in the ministry, JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

From both teachers we have learnt to trust in the native spiritual capacity of man, and to see that no real knowledge of GOD can be given to us at second hand. The beginning of religion must be for us in the inward witness of the Spirit, the immediate presence of GOD in our own deeper life, making us aware of a goodness after which we must strive, wakening in us that immemorial restlessness, which can find rest in GOD alone. But what these inward promptings mean we learn more and more clearly to understand in our life together, in all human relations in the world, through the mystery, the beauty, the wonder of creation, through growing insight into duty, through larger knowledge of the height and depth of human love, and the capacity of pure and lofty character. Yet always it is the Spirit that teaches inwardly, bearing witness to what is true and beautiful and good, and when we are brought face to face with CHRIST, bearing witness to him, that in him is the true manhood, the true spirit of life for all the children of GOD.

Thus in a sense whatever gives us further knowledge of life, and insight into its deeper meaning, mediates between us and GOD, because so He teaches us, speaking to us, making us understand; but always He Himself is nearer to us than these instruments of His, and it is He who reveals to us their meaning. Thus Nature mediates, and every true human life, every friend who touches a better impulse in us and sets before us a loftier ideal—and so above all he who is the "Great Friend to all the sons of men." How much this means Dr. MARTINEAU describes in the first of the two sermons on "Christ, the Divine Word."

Herein lie the "grace and truth that came by Jesus Christ." In completely realising the filial relation to God, he at once glorified the dependent, obedient, suffering life which is assigned to us; and rose to the height of that divine kinship which makes the affections of heaven and earth reciprocal, and identifies the essence of moral perfection in both spheres. The Man of Sorrows is our personal exemplar; the Son of God is our spiritual ideal; in whose harmonious and majestic soul, imperturbable in justice, tender in mercy, stainless in purity, and bending in protection over all guileless truth, an objective reflection of the Divine holiness is given us, answering and interpreting the subjective revelation of the conscience. Nor is it without significance that his solitary and homeless position, his free and wandering life, his various contact with every light and shade of the human drama, deliver to us the impression of his inward spirit, the cast of his affections, and the characteristics of his will, as a pure image of character, divested of local limits, unconstrained as the wind, and flexible as the compassions of God. What wonder then that here we make a further step in our conception and colouring of the Infinite Perfection; and that as humanity served for its symbol better than nature, so in Christ we find a higher and intenser than in humanity at large. And when it is said, of this personal appearance of divine qualities of mind on the theatre and under the conditions of human life, that the "Word" itself "was made flesh and dwelt among us," the phrase simply affirms that these qualities are not mere earth-born and animal phenomena, but are really the Living Word of a heavenly sphere and speak of God.

They speak to us of GOD because the Inward Witness declares to us that this is the divinest truth, and we come to GOD through CHRIST when he wakens in us the better manhood, that we may the better understand what our sonship means. In one of the recently-published letters to Professor KNIGHT, quoted by Mr. ARMSTRONG in his review of "Inter Amicos," Dr. MARTINEAU shows how there can be no other final testimony to the truth. Elements in the character depicted in the Fourth Gospel he finds to be not historical, and not beautiful :—

> Nor do I think that the true image of what he was is reached till he is divested of the whole dress which the Messianic mythology and Alexandrine theosophy have thrown round him in our Gospels. This done, the figure which emerges is to my eye simply human—of ideal strength and beauty—the purest model of the relation between God and the soul of man; but with no inapprehensible element transcending our inner scale of spiritual possibility.

And, again, towards the close of the letter :—

> The more I reflect upon these things the more profoundly convinced I am that the idea of an historical Incarnation affords no permanent standing-ground for a Religious Philosophy; and I look upon it as the transitory means of saving the supreme truth—which Theism would else have lost—of the life of God in the soul of man, a life intense in proportion to self-surrender. (1870.)

In Dr. MARTINEAU's view, as we saw in the sermon on "The God of the Living," at the opening of Oakfield-road Church, in 1864, CHRIST was a past not a "present Mediator," his was a mediatorial mind, because of what he manifested in the past of the true life with God, which opened for his disciples "direct relation, face to face, with the FATHER of spirits," leaving to them "primary converse with the Soul of souls."

And so also Mr. THOM, in the Farewell sermon, which we quoted last week, reminded his hearers that "none of us are spiritually taught until GOD Himself teaches us," and that the great office of a Mediator was "not to detain a soul with himself, but to place it in personal communion with the Fountain of life"—"to lead us into the real Presence and leave us there, having removed every evil that could hide our FATHER's face."

As to Mr. THOM's own position, when he had passed out of the Arianism in which he had been reared, Dr. MARTINEAU wrote as follows in the Memorial Preface to "A Spiritual Faith" :—

> Mr. Thom could the more easily let go the Arian conception of a superhuman Christ, as his deepening religious consciousness assured him of the immediate living intercommunion between the human spirit and the Divine; so that for the knowledge of God the conditions were ever present in our own minds—their actual or possible experiences; and there was no need of an intermediate being, different in natural rank and sphere of existence, to come and tell us what else was out of our reach. What is spiritually discerned has not to travel through space and be carried by messengers, but is either intuitively given, or passed direct from mind to mind in immediate relation. When once we have realised that "all minds are of one family," we know that what one "reveals" to another flows from its deeper experience, its fuller life, its higher perfection. God is His own Revealer, in so far as "He is for ever presenting Himself in personal acts to the souls of men," so that "Conscience will not suffer us to doubt that He is there in person," and that "He holds direct intercourse with us through reason and conscience." And Christ is "the Revealer," by completely realising God's idea of Humanity as related to Himself. "He taught a religion by being a Religion. He is himself the glorious gospel of the blessed God. This is My Son, God said, and says, to all the sons of men." To fulfil in the Christian "God's law of eternal progress," "the perfection of Jesus must be the goal of his desire."

It would thus seem that the chief endeavour of our Christian discipleship must be, not to formulate any theory concerning CHRIST, or to accept any theory ready made, nor to be troubled over much by questions of his "absolute" perfection, or the final character of any revelation that may come to us from him, but rather to set ourselves to be of the same mind, to understand more of the meaning of his manhood, to be with him, in the same spirit of trust and love, as children of our FATHER. We must begin not with an abstract, but with a practical Theism, obedient to the Inward Teacher, simply doing our FATHER'S will. Then we shall be ready to enter into the mind of CHRIST, and to receive the deeper conviction, the clearer and more blessed vision, which are given to the completer man. Reverent study of the teaching and the life of JESUS invites us, with inexhaustible interest, to the highest discipline of character; and at the same time to the supreme test of divine truth, to prove its power and reality in the actual life of our churches and of each individual disciple. We may dispute in the schools as to the exact meaning of Divine Immanence or Incarnation, but in religion, which is our life, we are thankful with our friends, and with him who in all the generations has been our best Friend among the sons of men, to learn more and more perfectly to enter into communion with our FATHER, to do the work of His Kingdom here on earth, while we rest with faith in the thought of the larger fellowship of the Household of GOD.

VERSES FROM "OUR MASTER."

HE cometh not a King to reign;
The world's long hope is dim;
The weary centuries wait in vain
The clouds of heaven for him.

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee.

The healing of his seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

Our Friend, our Brother and our Lord,
What may thy service be?—
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word,
But simply following thee.

Thy litanies, sweet offices
Of love and gratitude;
Thy sacramental liturgies
The joy of doing good.

The heart must ring thy Christmas bells,
Thy inward altars raise;
Its faith and hope thy canticles,
And its obedience praise!

IF your hands are left empty, it is only that they may seek and hold better gifts. —Emerson.

HENRY SEPTIMUS SUTTON.

To many of our readers the name of Henry Septimus Sutton no doubt first became known through the inclusion of some of his verses from "Rose's Diary" in Dr. Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," but very few of those who were attracted by the simplicity and beauty of the verses, and their deep religious feeling, can have suspected that the writer was a working journalist in Manchester, and for more than forty years editor of the Alliance News.

When in 1886 a volume of Sutton's collected Poems* was published, a reviewer in the Spectator acknowledged that he had not known the author's name before except as attached to the following verses, which from their quaintness he had hitherto taken to belong to the seventeenth century, and which he judged to be not unworthy of Henry Vaughan.

"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

What if I perish, after all,
And lose this life, Thy gracious boon?
Let me not fear that I shall fall
And die too soon.

I cannot fall till Thou dost let,
Nor die, except at Thy command.
Low let me lie, my Father, yet
Beneath Thy hand.

'Tis good to think, though I decrease,
Thou dost not, Lord, decrease with me.
What matters it that I must cease,
Since Thou must be?

The life Thou willedst me I use
To thank Thee for that gracious will;—
If I must lose it, I would choose
To thank Thee still.

No more might I lift prayerful eyes,
Or sway a tongue to grateful tones;
Yet should a noise of praise still rise
Even from my bones.

But to a few discerning friends Sutton's poems, some of them published in 1848, and "Rose's Diary" in 1854, had long been a cherished possession. Emerson welcomed the earlier poems warmly, and of "Rose's Diary" Dr. Martineau once said, "It has long been to me as the presence of a tender and faithful friend." When Miss Cobbe showed the book to Fanny Kemble, she exclaimed, after reading some of the poems aloud: "Who on earth is this new Herbert or Vaughan you have discovered?" And Mr. Garrett Horder in a notice of Sutton in the tenth volume of Miles's "Poets of the Nineteenth Century" (p. 547) records the following emphatic judgment:—

I shall, I fear, astonish and perhaps shock some readers when I say that Mr. Sutton has a deeper religious nature than either Herbert or Vaughan. No one doubts Herbert's goodness, but too often his quaintness is mistaken for depth. Some of our editors of sacred anthologies seem willing to sacrifice nearly everything on the altar of quaintness; that is a quality not to be despised, but it is surely second to far-reaching vision of truth and passionate love to the Invisible God. For my part, I find far more points of likeness in Mr. Sutton's poems to certain of Miss Rossetti's; but even here there is a difference, accounted for by the fact that though both of them were mystics they were reared in vastly different schools of theological belief. But in spite of this, I think I could put side by side poems from these two poets which at heart strike the selfsame note—another illustration of how the really mystic mind overleaps, through its clear vision of God, all sundering doctrines concerning His nature.

It is as a poet, as the writer of a few short poems which are not likely soon to die, that Sutton is chiefly attractive to us, but for that very reason there is interest in the story of his life, and his prose writings, marking the progress of his religious thought, are not the least striking part of that story.

Henry Septimus Sutton was a native of Nottingham, where he was born Feb. 10, 1825. His father was a printer and bookseller in Bridlesmith-gate, and proprietor of the Nottingham Review; and though Henry Sutton as a youth began to study medicine, his love of literature soon drew him away from that career and he became a journalist. He wrote first for his father's paper, and when he was twenty-five settled as a reporter in Manchester, where the rest of his life was spent, and where he died last May, at the age of seventy-six.

Before removing from Nottingham he had made his first ventures as an author, both in prose and verse. In 1847 he published his first little book (printed at his father's works). It was in prose, with the title, "The Evangel of Love: interpreted by Henry Sutton," and on the title-page the motto:—

That which befits us, embosomed in beauty and wonder as we are, is cheerfulness and courage, and the endeavour to realise our aspirations.

The book is the work of an eager and enthusiastic young man, searching into the deeper questions of life, with bold affirmation of the fundamental principles of spiritual religion, apart from all the special doctrines of orthodox Christianity. Sutton writes as an ardent follower of Emerson, and appeals directly to the inward witness to all spiritual truth.

"TRUST THYSELF." That is almost, in these times, the first of Christian necessities. By self-reliance, however, something very different to reliance on self is meant; but it implies a reliance on God for oneself, and the refusal to receive news of Him through any living or traditionary attorney, without also resorting to the means of verification which exist within every man who is a child of God. . . . The world has been priest-ridden and book-ridden long enough, and it is time these things came to a full end. . . . So long as we think religion to be a thing that relates to notions we shall differ, we shall quarrel. . . . In religion goodness must be supreme.

Those sentences show clearly enough the line his thinking took in those early days. Of the poems published in the following year we gather that there were two booklets, though we have not been able to see the original copies. One was a collection of shorter poems, dedicated to his father; the other, his longest poem, "Clifton Grove Garland," which records his delight as a young man in natural beauty, describing familiar scenes near Nottingham, and introducing the local classics Kirke White, William and Mary Howitt, and Philip Bailey, whose "Festus" had been first published nine years before. This and the shorter poems are included in the volume of 1886, but the poems are "now revised," so that one does not quote as from 1848 with confidence.

One of the most striking of the shorter poems is "A Preacher's Soliloquy," which is included in Palgrave's "Treasury of Sacred Song." It describes the preacher's eagerness to gather all men in, and help them on the upward way—

Because God's love is swift and strong,
Therefore ye all to me belong.

And then he continues his soliloquy:—

Why do I dare love all mankind?
'Tis not because each face, each form
Is comely, for it is not so;
Nor is it that each soul is warm
With any Godlike glow;
Yet there's no one to whom's not given
Some little lineament of heaven,
Some partial symbol, at the least, in sign
Of what should be, if it is not, within Reminding of the death of sin
And life of the Divine.
There was a time, full well I know,
When I had not yet seen you so;
Time was when few seemed fair;
But now, as through the streets I go,
There seems no face so shapeless, so
Forlorn, but that there's something there
That, like the heavens, doth declare
The glory of the great All-fair;
And so mine own each one I call,
And so I dare to love you all.

Then he gives thanks for his own place among mankind, "Heaven's possible novitiates, with self-subduing freedom free," and reminds them that they alone are royal "who are the truly good."

Yet are ye angels in disguise,
Angels who have not found your wings;
I see more in ye than ye are
As yet, while earth so closely clings;
. . . . . .
Alas! why will ye not from sin arise,
And be Christ's beautiful?

Emerson, as we have said, welcomed these early poems of Sutton's very warmly, and seems also to have been struck by his "Evangel of Love." Sutton, in his young enthusiasm, went over to Manchester in 1848 to hear Emerson lecture, and to see his "Master" face to face. Then began also his friendship with the late Alexander Ireland, and this, no doubt, was what determined him in 1850 to settle in Manchester. For the first few years he was connected with the Manchester Examiner and Times, and became chief of the reporting staff, but then in 1854 he accepted the editorship of the Alliance News, a post which he held for forty-four years. Up to the time of his death he remained the chief leader-writer for his paper, and by the freshness of his advocacy, his quiet persistence and enthusiasm rendered great service to the cause of temperance reform. To this, grateful testimony was borne by Sir Wilfred Lawson and other members of the United Kingdom Alliance at the time of his retirement. In considering Sutton's work as a poet and religious thinker, it should not be forgotten that his life had this practical side, of which a large part was patient drudgery cheerfully performed. For ten years (1859–69) he was also editor of Meliora, a magazine devoted to the cause of enlightenment and social reform.

The same year, 1854, in which Sutton entered on what was to be the chief practical work of his life, saw also the publication of his most substantial book, which included as an appendix, "Rose's Diary," the masterpiece among his poems. This book has the strange title "Quinquenergia; or, Proposals for a New Practical Theology." Using a slight framework of fiction it tells, partly in verse, but chiefly in prose, how a group of friends conversed together on the great questions of life, drawing out the lines of a new ideal religion, as the happy possession of the people of "Quinquenergia." Their country seems to be so named, because of the five great powers, or elements, which constitute their religion. These are defined as follows:—

Justice or Conscientiousness: sense of duty.

Faith or Trust: sense of confidence.

Hope or Aspiration: sense of yearning towards the nobler and the better.

Reverence or Veneration: sense of profound respect.

Benevolence or Love: sense of disinterested affection.

Such is the Quinquenergian analysis of Religion. Hence we never speak of this or that Religion, implying any theologic distinction, as between Popery and Protestantism; but Religion with us is Justice, Faith, Aspiration, Reverence and Benevolence, wherever these are found. (p. 31.)

Of this, some verses in the Introduction also speak:—

What is it shows the Christian? Doctrine? No.
Religion 'tis, not Science; the access
Of very God unto the Human soul;
Here only is true Christian music found;
All else, without it, were an idle sound.

What is it shews the Christian?—Strenuous trust
In all the Father's ways; a life unstained;
A noble, earnest hope; imparting peace
All other peace, all ecstasy above;
The humble tears, and the undying love.

These come, not by historic faith, or creed,
Or new or ancient ritual. Not the name
Of God, or man, can give them. Neither blood
Nor water. Naught but breathing divine air;
Naught but the gracious, open hand of prayer.

It is a religion based not on external supernatural authority, but on inward spiritual experience. Parker's "Discourse on Matters pertaining to Religion," and F. W. Newman's "Phases of Faith," have helped to mould Sutton's thought, while the influence of Carlyle and Emerson are clearly dominant, "the great Emerson, my former master, my honoured friend still."

It is curious, in the light of Sutton's subsequent development, to note in the Preface a reference to "the grim Swedenborgian skeleton." But we are told that even while he was seeing the sheets of "Quinquenergia" through the press, he was led to pay closer attention to the teachings of the New Church; and another fresh influence was brought to bear upon him in the following year, when he began to attend the ministry of George Macdonald in Manchester. Two years later, he acknowledged that "Swedenborg's interpretation of the Bible is correct," and he became a member of the Peter-street Society. He was for many years a faithful Sunday-school teacher, and for some time was on the Preachers' Plan for the Manchester District. His pulpit services, thoughtful and unconventional, are said to have been much appreciated.

When Sutton became a Swedenborgian (he was then only thirty-two), he withdrew "Quinquenergia" from circulation, and even before then had wished to suppress "The Evangel of Love." He subsequently wrote some expositions of New Church doctrine,— Outlines of the Doctrines of the Mind according to Emanuel Swedenborg. No. 1. 1889.

Five Essays for Students of the Divine Philosophy of Swedenborg. 1895.

The Saviour's Triple Crown. 1898.

The Golden Age. The Seventh Essay for Students of the Divine Philosophy of Swedenborg. 1900.

But for lovers of Sutton's poems "Quinquenergia"* must always have a great attraction, as belonging to the time when "Rose's Diary" was written. Some of its other verse is also preserved, in a revised form, among the collected poems, e.g., "A Hymn of Creation," "The Earth Defaced," and "The Battle of God." These are all in the metre of "Rose's Diary," as will be seen from these concluding verses of "A Hymn of Creation":—

Yea, Father, even so! And still Thy love
Strives ever to attract our hearts above
To Thee and to Thy high angelic throne;—
And yet to basest levels we how prone,
And deaf to all Thy Word's appealing tone!

But now we kneel before Thee, and we say—
Prayer lived in, lived out, this th' appointed way;
O help us then to live e'en as we pray,
Humbly, and taught of God, and striving still
To be obedient to Thy holy will;—

Thence rising to the sure unfailing trust;
The good deeds done, no more because we must,
But that we love to do them;—sevenfold peace,
All other peace, all ecstasy above;—
Light ever-growing—ever-largening love.

It is hardly too much to say that Sutton's work as a poet was substantially done before he was thirty, though the later revisions mark a chastening of taste as well as a more definite form of theological thought.

But in "Rose's Diary" some of the most perfect of the poems are hardly altered, and only one is added to the twenty-three which originally appeared as an appendix to "Quinquenergia." The kind of alteration made may be seen from the three following examples. In the last poem Sutton wrote originally:—

Out in the garden of the soul, that wide,
Glad, fragrant paradise, I go by prayer.

This in 1886 has become—

Out in the garden of the Word, that wide
Glad paradise, we are borne on by prayer.

In the best known poem of all, with the refrain "How beautiful it is to be alive!" the second verse in 1854 began—

To read in some good book, until we feel
Love for the one who wrote it;

This was altered to the more definite form—

To read in God's great Book, until we feel
Love for the Love that gave it.

And in the twentieth poem of the 1886 edition (which was the fourth in 1854), we find that "Into the Saviour's Wisdom, Love and Power" has taken the place of the earlier "Into the God-Light, into the God-Power."

"Rose's Diary" is a memorial to S. N. Rose Fryor, a friend of Sutton's early

* There is a copy of "Quinquenergia" in Dr. Williams's Library, but not, so far as we have been able to discover, in the British Museum Library, which has, however, "The Evangel of Love."

years in Nottingham, the wife of one of his friends, whose pure and beautiful nature deeply influenced his life, and who died in the year of his removal to Manchester. The "Diary" is in sections, which tell of the varied experiences of the inward religious life. They are to be taken not as in any way describing his friend, but as attempting to picture what the religion of such a one must have been, from whom he had himself learnt so much.

The opening verses, which begin

I have a little trembling light, which still
All tenderly I keep, and ever will, picture by that image the inward life of devout trust in God.

Sometimes it seems there is no flame at all;
I look quite close because it is so small:
Then all for sorrow do I weep and sigh;
But Some One seems to listen when I cry,
And the light burns up, and I know not why.

This opening poem, with the last verses of the third, Dr. Martineau has included as one piece in his "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," ending

O do Thou feed
Thy light, that it burn ever, and succeed
My life to truest holiness to lead.

As to prayer Sutton says in one of his most characteristic verses:

Prayer is the hand that catcheth hold on peace;
Nay, 'tis the very heart of nobleness,
Whose pulses are the measure of the stress
Wherewith He doth us, we do Him, possess.
If these should fail, all our true life would cease.

The mystic seeker for the Inward Light is, however, aware how life can only be sound and healthy when active in daily faithfulness, going out from self in unselfish service.

Unless I strive these people dear to bless,
I do not love my God. If still I seek
No good or joy of theirs, and acquiesce
In what makes weak the strong, or wrongs the weak,
Myself of God's own love I dispossess.

I must begin to live for others now:
Some wisely-loving work must now commence.
Soon will this sun go down; alas, and how Should I then dare with any confidence
A second dawn to look for and avow?

Who works not for his fellows starves his soul;
His thoughts grow poor and dwindle, and his heart
Grudges each beat as misers do a dole;
He dies anon, and shall with them have part
Who find in death an everlasting goal.

And again, though shrinking from the task of religious utterance, he knows that he must speak:—

Put not on me, O Lord! this work divine,
For I am too unworthy, and Thy speech
Would be defrauded through such lips as mine.
I have not learned Thee yet, and shall I teach?
O choose some other instrument of Thine!

The great, the royal ones, the noble saints,
These all are Thine, and they will speak for Thee.
No one who undertakes Thy words but faints;
Yet, if that man is saintly and sin-free,
Through him Thou wilt, O Lord! self-uttered be.

But how shall I say anything, a child,
Not fit for such high work,—oh! how shall I
Say what in speaking must not be defiled?
And yet, and yet if I refuse to try,
The light that burns for my own life will die.

To these poems of practical faithfulness may be added one on the discipline of temper:—

My mind was ruffled with small cares today,
And I said hasty words, and did not keep Long-suffering patience well; and now how deep
My sorrow for this sin! In vain I weep
For foolish words I never can unsay.

Yet not in vain, oh surely not in vain!
This trouble must compel me to take heed;
And surely I shall learn how much I need
Thy constant strength mine own to help indeed,
And all my thought to patience to constrain.

Yes, I shall learn at length, though I neglect
Day after day to use my help from Thee.
O aid me that I always recollect
Thy gentle-heartedness; and O correct
Whatever else of sin Thou seest in me!

Other poems tell of sin and penitence, and the constant striving of an earnest soul for a nearer approach to God.

Sutton's love of Nature and delight in all beautiful things cannot be separated from his religion. It finds utterance in two of the most beautiful poems of the Diary:—

The day with light its genial self engirds;
The trees are glad with fluty voices dear:
"Thou art my God!" When I say o'er these words,
I see a light beyond the day, and hear
Voices far richer than the songs of birds.

Mine eyes with happy tears then overswim;
The thoughts I have are sweetest that can be;
My mind's a cup with love above the brim;
Fine incense circles round whate'er I see;
In every sound I hear a holy hymn.

Thou art my God! Thou, Father, Thou my friend;
My Saviour Thou, the eternal Lord of all!
O thought which doth all other thoughts transcend,
Beneath whose stress well may I prostrate fall
In love and wonder which should know no end!

And this other, the most delightful of all his verses:—

How beautiful it is to be alive!
To wake each morn as if the Maker's grace
Did us afresh from nothingness derive,
That we might sing, "How happy is our case,
How beautiful it is to be alive!

To read in God's great Book, until we feel
Love for the Love that gave it; then to kneel
Close unto Him Whose truth our souls will shrive,
While every moment's joy doth more reveal
How beautiful it is to be alive!

Rather to go without what might increase
Our worldly standing, than our souls deprive
Of frequent speech with God, or than to cease
To feel, through having wasted health or peace,
How beautiful it is to be alive!

Not to forget, when pain and grief draw nigh,
Into the ocean of time past to dive
For memories of God's mercies, or to try
To bear all sweetly, hoping still to cry,
"How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Thus ever towards man's height of nobleness
Strive still some new progression to contrive;
Till, just as any other friend's, we press
Death's hand; and, having died, feel none the less
How beautiful it is to be alive!

In later years, except for the remodelling of his earlier work, Sutton seems to have written very little verse, and that little chiefly in the form of memorials of friends.

In November, 1885, when he was preparing the collected edition of his poems, he wrote some lines dedicating the later "Gleanings" specially to his wife. In this dedication he says:—

And now that the summer is o'er,
And the autumn is ending,
I through the old garden once more
My way have been wending,
To cull, in the mist and the cold,
And the wet and the waning,
Whatever of new or of old
Might still be remaining.

. . . . .

Thou'lt praise them no less though they tell
That winter is coming;
Yet let them foreshadow as well
Our heavenly homing;
The winter will nip and will sting
And blacken and harden,
But in the soon-following spring
We'll have a new garden.

That was written five years after the second overwhelming sorrow of Sutton's life, for he had lost his first wife, who had shared his home in the early years of his Manchester life, and in 1880 he lost his only son, a young man of great promise, who at the time of his death was a student at Balliol College. For himself the autumn and the peaceful winter were prolonged, not without some warnings of serious illness, until, on May 2, the summons came for him, and, "just as any other friend's," he pressed Death's hand, and, having died, found none the less

"How beautiful it is to be alive."

"AS THE SOUND OF MANY WATERS."

AMONG the Fells of North Lancashire that lie to the west and north of Coniston, this sound was listened to with much delight and exultation of spirit, in the early August days. No rain had fallen for many weeks till then, and all the becks were low and silent. The stony channels that seam the hillsides were dry, and the waterfalls were little more than damp rocks, over which the last drainings of the higher slopes slipped softly down. But after twenty-four hours of rain the mountains found their voice, the becks grew loud again—pleasant, yet strong and imperious too.

And all the air was filled with pleasant noise of waters;

I suppose that this sound of running streams and rushing waterfalls was the more impressive—more full of melody and meaning to the ear—because of the unaccustomed stillness of the days before. In the Lake district one always expects to hear the voice of the waters; it is a part of the welcome which the hills offer to him who has loved them and trod them with joy. The silence was strange and almost disconcerting now. Something was at fault with the beloved region, and the visitor could join with herdsmen and gardeners in the hope of rain.

And the rain came: at first, only the quiet, steady falling of the mist-showers. The hill-clouds descended slowly into the valleys and gently watered the dry fields and made the thirsty lawns and gardens glad. The early sunlight laid one broad, bright rainbow across the opposite hills, beautiful in the moist, grey morning. But soon the heavy storm clouds gathered over Wetherlam and the Old Man of Coniston. Lightnings flashed there, and thunders boomed and rumbled among the great Fells, and the rain came down swiftly, in large drops, sweeping through the air, flooding all the land, and covering the level surface of the lake with circling wavelets of bright foam. All through the day and night the great rains fell, and next morning the steeper slopes of the hills were marked with the long white lines of rushing streamlets, hastening downwards from the heights to swell the becks on lower ground. Then this wild and glorious region of English mountain landscape took on its more sublime and characteristic forms. And while the dalesman and his fields and his flocks and herds rejoiced in this blessing of the clouds, a stranger, with holiday hours to spare, must needs go up among the hills, though the rain still fell, and listen to their recovered voices, and feel the "power of sound" which Nature wields over the human spirit on great days of storm.

Following a beck upwards on the way to its source, I was soon shut in by the dark rocks and the dripping pines and the heavy mists that folded all the higher slopes and hid the sky. Far below me, and behind, lay the beautiful lake and the little town that nestles on its western shore. Above, and in front, the foaming streams and the confused yet accordant sound of their many voices drew one on, far into the heart and home of the great tumult. And so, all through the long wet August afternoon, I wandered there with the mists and the mountain birds, among the bending ferns, heavy with moisture, the mosses that cling to the lower rocks, and the bare crags that towered, dark and mystic, away up into the gloom.

How wonderful is the "sound of many waters," heard thus amid the solitudes of the Fells; how full of meaning and yet of mystery! Nature is speaking to her human child, who chances to stray there, far from the trouble and turmoil of the crowded places of the world. She is telling him some part of her mighty secret, could he only understand and interpret. As he listens and tries to be passively receptive, something, it may be, of her living spirit passes into the soul and makes it stronger and healthier—more reverent, more earnest, more aspiring, and yet more content. He cannot put into words the thought or emotion that is borne in upon him there. He cannot translate that mountain music into human speech, or tell the secret of that joy which takes possession of the heart. But his life should be the nobler for it. A greater sincerity, a loftier purpose, a more patient will, ought to rule his conduct and pervade his thinking, in all after days.

Yet is it a little vain and frivolous, perhaps, for the pilgrim to be moralising thus, even to himself, in days of recreation, amid such scenes and sounds. Wiser were it to lay to rest for a while this stern reflective human consciousness, and be but as a child there, listening, loving, and responsive to the large free ministry of Nature, so friendly and gracious to him in such hours. The poet's mild rebuke, though uttered a hundred years ago, and on a bright clear sunny morning, comes borne to him on the mist-laden winds:—

> Think you 'mid this mighty sum
> Of things for ever speaking,
> That nothing of itself will come,
> But we must still be seeking?

The sounds of flowing and of falling waters are wonderfully varied and changeful; so many different tones this fluid force in nature can send forth. The plash of the rain-drops on the trees and on the rocks, the murmur of the hidden rills, the rush of the strong stream, the dash and roar of the waterfall, the plunge and hiss of the breaking wave—how wide is the scope of sound over which these different voices range! The strings of that invisible harp, on which the moving waters play, must be many. "The key-notes," said a friend to me a day or two after, as we walked through the dales that had become garrulous and vocal now, "the key-notes of these mountain becks are all different; each one sings or chants its own distinctive melody." And it was so. Nature is rarely monotonous—perhaps never when she is in movement. The waters play upon the many obstacles that check, or try to check, their flowing, and bring forth new and ever-changing music, as they hasten over or round or beneath them. The wind, too, when it blows among the wayside grasses or across the ripening corn, or through the pines or down the rocky passes of the hills, calls forth a different voice from each. The birds, the insects, the beasts of the field, which we often, in our foolish human pride, call "dumb," have all their varied tones of utterance, and help to make that rich harmonious music that floats about the world.

It is well to hear these many sounds of Nature, not as mere sounds, or as a noise made by inanimate and senseless things. They are voices of that Living Power which is the Soul of Nature and the source of her immense activity. Readers of Wordsworth—the poet who from these his own native mountain regions, called on men to lay a closer ear to the lips of the great Mother—will know how sensitive his own ear was to the many-voiced life of natural things. This poet, who dwelt so close to the mighty heart of all, had learned to hear, almost as if they were spoken words, the sounds that wander over the earth and take possession of the wide spaces of invisible air. "Not only the grander tones of the waterfall or the roaring of storms impress him, but he treasures all the tiny sounds, down to the piping of the stonechat or the sandlark, and all the 'milder minstrelsies of rural scenes.'"

> The stream, so ardent in its course before,
> Sent forth such sallies of glad sound, that all
> Which I, till then, had heard appeared the voice
> Of common pleasure; beast and bird, the lamb,
> The shepherd's dog, the linnet and the thrush,
> Vied with the waterfall and made a song
> Which, while I listened, seemed like the wild growth,
> Or like some natural produce of the air
> That could not cease to be.

Of one who could mimic the nightbird's song so well that it replied to him, in the pauses of his call, Wordsworth says that—

> While he hung
> Listening, a gentle shock of mild surprise
> Has carried far into his heart the voice
> Of mountain torrents.

He thought that, even in infancy, the river that flowed past his earliest home had power to influence his own life through sound:—

> For this didst thou,
> O Derwent! winding among grassy holms
> Where I was looking on, a babe in arms,
> Make ceaseless music that composed my thoughts
> To more than infant softness, giving me
> Amid the fretful dwellings of mankind
> A foretaste, a dim earnest, of the calm
> That Nature breathes among the hills and groves.

In schoolboy days he had learned to feel—

> Whate'er there is of power in sound
> To breathe an elevated mood.

And what in later years he said to his sister must have been true of himself—

> Thy mind
> Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
> Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
> For all sweet sounds and harmonies.*

Once, on that wet August afternoon, I stood where a strong mountain stream, which just above was broad and clear, its pellucid waters showing every rock and pebble of the uneven channel, was suddenly narrowed in between two massive boulders. As it plunged through these, the clear brown water was changed into whitest foam, and then below them it was met by a huge rock, whose broad flat surface seemed meant to bar all further progress of the stream. It checked, but could not stay, the advancing waters; the strong swift torrent made one splendid wave-like curve of foam, leaped round the opposing rock, and then sped onward, tossing its spray on either side, and giving forth a voice that sounded there, in that wild region, like the song of victory, of freedom, and of unconquerable joy. And I thought (moralising again) that, could we but obey the law of our own life, like those exultant waters, could we thus meet all hindrances that press upon us, all obstacles that try to block the way—could we in such wise meet these, that they should only serve to increase the vigour of our movement, and change to greater beauty and charge with nobler melody the onward course of our progressive action, then full surely 'twould be well!

FREEDOM AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Sir,—Mr. Upton is evidently determined to drive me to that "hill retired," where Milton's fallen angels "reasoned high" of "fix'd fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute," and "found no end, in wandering mazes lost."

1. I said that "upon the fact of Moral Responsibility, all but materialists are agreed: a rational being is accountable for his actions—accountable to himself, to society, and to the Almighty." The context showed that I wished to distinguish between the fact of Moral Responsibility, so understood, and any theory of volition, such as Libertarianism or Determinism, which is offered as an explanation of what happens in the mind when we will an action. Granting this distinction, the only question is, what theory of volition affords the best explanation of the fact of Responsibility? The mass of mankind, believing most firmly in Moral Responsibility, have no theory of volition whatever; no one feels the need of a theory, unless he is specially interested in the psychological, ethical, or theological problems to which this and other facts of our nature give rise. Now Mr. Upton says that this distinction between fact and theory rests on an "equivocal use" of the words Moral Responsibility. How does he support the accusation? By identifying Moral Responsibility with various rival theories as to the nature of volition, and attributing to me the opinion, "much in vogue among Absolute Idealists," that all these theories "lead to the same ethical goal"! I never said, nor implied, anything of the sort; I said that these theories are offered as rival interpretations of the same ethical fact. And I do not think that even the "Absolute Idealist" can be charged with maintaining that the various theories of volition are "morally indifferent." The "Absolute Idealist" means by Moral Responsibility just what Common Sense means: that man, knowing himself to be the centre and source of his own actions, is conscious of his present imperfection and of an obligation to be better. But the "Absolute Idealist" rejects the Libertarian theory as maintained by Dr. Martineau, and defends another theory which, he claims, gives a truer explanation and justification of the fact of Responsibility. Mr. Upton denies the validity of this claim; and in this respect, I no not know what cause of complaint he has against me, for in the book from which he quoted, and in the same passage from which he quoted, I tried to show that the "Absolute Idealist's" theory of the will, as expounded in the writings of Professor T. H. Green, is a failure. It is an attempt to combine the scientific advantages of Determinism with the ethical advantages of Libertarianism; and this combination does not seem to be possible.

2. What is the alternative? Determinism in its consistent form means fatalism—our actions are the result of external forces. There remains, then, the Libertarian theory. What does this theory tell us, and on what grounds is it maintained? To my mind, Mr. Upton's favourite formula—"the man either could have done otherwise, or could not"—has not nearly as much importance as he assigns to it. To say that it is "possible" for me to do a thing, or that I "can" do it, means that there is nothing outside myself to prevent me; or it means nothing at all. It implies only the absence of external necessity or constraint. And to say that I "can not" do it, that it is "impossible"—if the words are to be taken seriously—means that there is some power outside myself which prevents it. I can find no other meaning for the words "possible" and "impossible." Hence Mr. Upton's final test question has only a deceptive appearance of exactness—"In the moral crisis, could the man have acted otherwise, or could he not?" When its real meaning is expressed, the question takes this form—"What was the effect of surrounding circumstances on the man's action?" I believe that this is the interpretation of Common Sense. When the question is pressed, "Was it possible for us to have acted otherwise?" Common Sense at once understands it to mean, "Were the circumstances too strong for us?" And the true verdict of experience is that circumstances are sometimes too strong, but not always. Whenever they are not too strong, we "could have acted otherwise." And the meaning of "freedom" which we reach by this line of thought is—the power to set oneself free from, or to overcome, outward hindrances.

3. The attempt is sometimes made to argue that we are conscious of "freedom." I am no more conscious of freedom than I am conscious of the properties of the oxygen in the atmosphere. I am unconscious of compulsion or necessity; but, as Spinoza said, every act and thought might be as strictly determined as the fall of a stone is, and yet we might not be "conscious" of it. The direct appeal to consciousness leads to no result.

4. We are, however, conscious of moral obligation; there is something that we ought to do, and an ideal of character that we ought to be. On this basis, moral freedom was explained by Kant, in a manner at once simple and profound: "ought" implies "can." It is possible for us to do that which it is our duty to do; or duty itself is an illusion. Moral freedom is an inference from the fact of moral duty, from which the idea of freedom derives all its meaning. "When Duty whispers low, Thou must," the soul replies, I can.

Holywood, co. Down.

Sir,—Mr. Upton concludes his letter in this week's Inquirer with the following sentence:—"A man must believe either that it was possible for him in some of the moral crises of his life to have decided otherwise than he did decide, or that it was not possible; there is no conceivable middle course." No, but if he believes that it was not possible to have decided otherwise this does not exclude repentance and remorse. He may recognise why it was not possible, he may regret that it was so, and may be stimulated to such self-development as shall make it impossible so to decide in future. By this view of Responsibility we avoid the irrational notions about sin and the possibility of offending God.

BAZAARS AND THEIR SUBSTITUTES.

Sir,—Those of us who feel that bazaars are not the best means of raising money for our various activities must hail with delight the news which comes from one of our Highbury churches where the vicar, who shares our objections, has been most successful in finding, as I think, "a more excellent way," and therefore I shall be obliged if you will kindly insert the enclosed extract from one of the church newspapers.

Marian Pritchard.

11, Highbury-crescent, Aug. 20.

Autumn is now hard upon us when such a vast amount of church energy is usually devoted to the organisation of bazaars and sales of work as means of raising money for church purposes. The Rev. R. Catterall, vicar of St. Augustine's, Highbury, N., does not believe in bazaars. He thinks they are among other things a roundabout and wasteful method of obtaining funds for church work. He thinks that when any special sum is required it is best to appeal directly to the parishioners to subscribe the sum required at an ordinary service by means of the offertory. A week or two ago he had an opportunity of putting his theories to the test of practice, and the result was a remarkable success.

At a meeting of the Church Council on June 17 it was decided that an attempt should be made to renovate and to decorate the church this year. To do the work thoroughly and well would, it was estimated, involve an outlay of at least £1,000. The churchwardens set aside Sunday, July 28, as a day upon which a great united effort should be made to provide the full means for this work.

The vicar, in a special appeal to the congregation and parishioners, said they had a very strong belief that if the very many friends of St. Augustine's would unite in a spirit of faith, prayer, and self-denial, to make a special effort, the whole of this very large sum might easily be given on the one Sunday. He added: "May I venture very earnestly to ask you to aid the work to the very utmost of your power. . . . In the acknowledgment of your kind gifts, may I say that no list of names will be issued. I hold your names with numbers attached which are marked on the cards and envelopes. And I hold them in strictest confidence. In the parish magazine of August, the numbers will be printed with the amounts given placed opposite to them."

The result was, as we have already intimated, a surprising success. Nearly double the amount asked for was received—namely, £1,824.

In answer to an inquiry by our representative as to his method of organising this collection, Mr. Catterall writes to us:—

The essentials of successful appeal in such an instance as mine seem to me to be (1) The possession of the confidence of one's people. This must come by the evidence to them of one's desire to work for them and with them. (2) The making request only for means to do absolutely necessary things.

(3) The knowledge (personal) of one's parishioners. This allows the appeal to be made personally to hundreds of persons. In my late effort I sent out 1,189 appeals to all sorts and conditions of persons. I think the effect of the cumulative offering of small sums has not yet been sufficiently comprehended. The August issue of my magazine contains the record of all the donations sent in in numbered cards and envelopes. And it contains also the balance-sheet of expenses. I find that the total cost of obtaining £1,824 has been £10 3s. 10d. This has been spent in stationary, printing, and postage.

Speaking further on the advantages of his plan, the vicar says: "It gives an opportunity by which every member—even the youngest—of the Church of England in the parish can be reached. No one can shield himself or herself from responsibility in this matter. Such personal opportunities the Church of England ought more and more to promote. The laying of the responsibility of the maintenance of her work upon the gifts of the few, instead of upon those of the many, has been, and is, one of our Church's great weaknesses. Why should ten men give £100 each, when 1,000 persons might feel honoured to give £1 each.

FORM AND SUBSTANCE IN WORSHIP.

Sir,—From the far North, where I am doing what I can to replenish the "inner" and the "outer" man, I send a short account of certain Sunday experiences which may be of interest to your readers. Finding, alas, that none of the many churches in this place were "Free" in the sense that we Unitarians look for, I turned my steps to the Episcopal Church in the hope that the Bishop of Argyll and the Isles (whom I had seen announced to preach) would offer me at least a few suggestive thoughts. Brought up in the Church of England, I felt no stranger to the fine old phrases of the Book of Common Prayer—marred though these were from time to time by the (to me) inadequate and unnecessary definitions of Orthodoxy. It was, however, when the good Bishop addressed us that I felt as one "wounded in the house of friends." I need not do more than refer to the laboured compilation of texts by which the preacher sought to show that "Christ was God." "If Jesus was not God, then we are relying on an arm of flesh," was one statement that would have amazed me, had I not previously met with similar statements in dogmatic circles. But I am concerned now with two points which impressed themselves specially on my mind, and these I think worth recounting.

In the first place I was struck by the way in which the forces of Modern Thought were wholly ignored throughout the discourse. Stress was laid on the inadequacy of "Intellect" in dealing with the Gospel records, and a parallel was drawn between acceptance by "faith" of these and acceptance of the "mysteries of the Holy Eucharist." "Doubt" was condemned, but no help was offered to the earnest inquirer; as in the days of my childhood, so now I heard that the doubter read the Scriptures only "unto condemnation." Surely, sir, the persistence in influential quarters of such teaching as this is one more justification (if such were needed) for the existence of those Churches which the outside world roughly describe as "Unitarian." Some of my friends have said, Why not strive after reform from within the Church? I think such a sermon as I have barely outlined above is a sufficient answer to this query.

And the second point which was specially brought home to me by the Bishop was contained in his references to one of ourselves. A wise "Unitarian" had expressed to him (the Bishop) his inability to attend the Church services because of the continual references to Christ's "Divinity"; and, indeed, went on the preacher, if Jesus were not God, then their whole service was "idolatry." But surely, I would ask, a "wise Unitarian" could look below words in themselves idolatrous to that hidden meaning which they are all along aiming at? As Emerson says, "We are wiser than we know," and this truth holds good especially in the sphere of religion. Because my fellow-men think differently from me, am I (under the given circumstances) to dissociate myself entirely from them in those forms which they use to express their sense of that Great Reality which Religion implies for all alike? I need not repeat all their phrases, nor need I join in their creeds, but can I not see beneath these the essence of that worship which is "in Spirit"?

THE CHRISTKATHOLISCHE MOVEMENT.

Sir,—May I venture to point out a slight chronological error in Dr. Schieler's paper in this week's Inquirer. He places Ronge and Czerski's Christkatholische movement as subsequent to Dr. Rupp's free evangelic congregation. I can well remember the excitement in Germany in October, 1844, when Ronge's letter to Bishop Arnoldi started the German Catholic movement, and the very general wonder which increasingly has grown, that the writer of that letter never afterwards equalled the vigour and brilliancy of the scathing sarcasm with which he denounced the exhibition of the Coat at Trier as an imposture.

CANON GORE ON EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS.

Preaching at Oxford on Sunday week in connection with the University Extension meeting, Canon Gore referred to the widespread discouragement in the minds of those who are most genuinely interested in national education. The following are passages from his sermon, as reported in the Oxford Chronicle:—The discouragement lay in the fact that after this half-century of reform it was impossible to say that there was a deeper or a wider thirst for knowledge in their public schools or Universities than there was at the beginning. There was a great elaboration of educational methods, but that elaboration of educational methods was not comparable to the elaboration in the methods of amusement, and the thirst for knowledge could not be said to be greater.

He supposed that what gave them most encouragement in the general aspect of education was the fact that the avenues of knowledge had been opened so widely for women by the side of men, and in this connection it was impossible on that day and in this place but to remember how much they owed to the Imperial lady whom Germany and England were that day united in deploring, whose real enthusiasm for the emancipation of women in the true and fullest sense of the word he supposed was not an inconsiderable element in what one must call the tragedy of a noble life. But still that encouraging feature had to be set side by side with many features not at all satisfactory.

If they passed beyond the particular place of education and went into the larger world, to what they called educated society, still they found that the love of knowledge was so slight that the slightest rise in the income-tax knocked off first of all, as a matter of course, as being plainly and most easily dispensable, the expenditure on books. During the last years the national book bill, if placed side by side with some other national bills, would certainly astonish them by its shrinkage, if they excluded from the expenditure what went in newspapers; in fact, it did appear to be the case not excluding the commercial world from their purview, as a nation, they did not appear to believe in knowledge. If they descended into the region of primary education they found those who were most serious there were also most discouraged in their outlook.

Again, they had a vast elaboration of the machinery and appliances of education, but they asked, was the result what their boys and girls, their young men and women, actually in the mass represented? Pleasure, the elaboration of pleasure, the demand for amusement, that was everywhere; money-making, the desire to get on, that was everywhere; the sort of capacity of education which was satisfied with the short paragraphs and headlines of their newspapers, that was everywhere. But plain living and high thinking, could they fairly say that after all their fifty years of educational reform that was on the increase? He feared the answer was more than doubtful.

If they looked round on their countrymen, as they met them in the train or in the family, and asked why was it they did not really care for knowledge, it was not that they lacked intelligence—that, at any rate, was a very small part of it, even so far as it was true; there was a wonderful capacity for intelligence in them, wonderful good sense and reasonableness, wonderful capacity for appreciating a fact if there be but the sufficiency of moral impulse to make men really undergo the trouble of distinguishing and knowing—it was lack of moral seriousness of purpose which hindered them; that and nothing else than that was the hindrance to the progress of education in the mass of the country. There would be no real intellectual progress in this England of ours without a profound recovery of moral seriousness, without real and widespread repentance—that was a change of moral purpose—without real and widespread conversion, without the turning of the heart and soul of man from the world, the flesh, and the devil to God and His righteousness. It was that change of will, that growth, that recovery of moral seriousness which could alone for our nation open again the gate and give them once more the key of knowledge. If our nation was to have moral life it must recover a wholesome fear of God, and with that fear would come a deepened sense of the value of religion, which put it in the first place, which sought first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Boston.—The chapel in Spain-lane has been cleaned and painted, and after being closed for two Sundays (the services being conducted in the schoolroom), was reopened on Sunday last, the pulpit being occupied by the Rev. William C. Hall, M.A., of Ashton-under-Lyne. There was a good attendance and collection, and Mr. Hall's services were much appreciated.

Carrickfergus (Reopening).—On Sunday evening last this meeting-house was reopened in the presence of a surprisingly large congregation, the whole of the available seating accommodation being occupied. The few Unitarians in Carrick and the neighbourhood were present, and about seventy members of the Ballycarry congregation, including the Ballycarry choir, also six members of Moneyrea congregation, and three friends from Belfast. The remainder of the large congregation was made up of the people of Carrickfergus and district, belonging to other denominations. There were four reporters of the Press present, and reports of considerable length have appeared in the Belfast newspapers, giving part of the sermon by the Rev. R. Lyttle, on "The Ideal Christian Church," which is described as eloquent and impressive. The hearty singing, led by the Ballycarry choir, contributed much to the success of a very rousing service. On Sunday evening, Sept. 8, at 7.15, the next service will be conducted by the Rev. W. G. Marsden.

Tavistock.—The Rev. John Barron, of the Abbey Chapel, preached last Sunday morning and evening in the Wesleyan Church, Boscastle, Cornwall.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Autumnal Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be held, as we have already announced, at Leeds on Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 21 and 22. The Mill Hill Chapel Record gives further particulars of the meetings. The preacher on Monday afternoon is to be the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. At the public meeting in the evening the chair will be taken by Sir James Kitson, and among the speakers announced are the President, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Lady O'Hagan and Sir John Brunner. On Tuesday conferences are to be held morning and afternoon, at one of which an address on the Superannuation of Ministers will be given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

AN earlier meeting in the north, on which attention should also be concentrated, is the annual meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, to be held at Newcastle-on-Tyne, on Wednesday, October 2. The business meeting is announced for the morning, and at our afternoon conference the Rev. Frank Walters is to read a paper on "Twentieth Century Unitarianism." In the evening the President, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, will take the chair at a public meeting, and Dr. W. Blake Odgers, President of the B. and F.U.A., and the Rev. James Forrest, of Glasgow, are to be among the speakers.

THE third Methodist Œcumenical Conference opened on Wednesday in Wesley's Chapel, in the City-road, London. The first Œcumenical Conference was also held in London, twenty years ago, the second in 1891 at Washington, D.C. The Conference is to meet daily, morning and afternoon (except Sundays), until September 17, and the programme, which is full of interest, cannot be said to be too long, since it is to furnish matter for the consideration of the representatives of some thirty millions of people in all parts of the world. The Conference is divided into an Eastern and a Western section, the former including representatives of Wesleyan Methodism, the New Connexion, the Primitives, and others in this country, Continental churches and the Methodist churches of Australasia and South Africa. The United Methodist Church of Canada is included in the Western section, to which belong the other great churches of America, foremost among them, the Methodist Episcopal Church.

AT the opening session on Wednesday morning the sermon was preached by the American Bishop Galloway, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and was a plea for renewed emphasis on the essential need of personal experience of redemption in religion. The Bishop quoted Wesley's saying: "I make no opinion the term of my union with any man. I think and let think. What I want is holiness of life. They who have this are my brother and sister and mother," and declared that the mission of Methodism was above all to spread Scriptural holiness throughout the world. They must have personal experience of the redemptive efficacy of Christianity. There could not be too much charity, but there must be no relaxing of the fundamental verities of the Gospel.

ON August 25 special services were held in Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, in connection with the Annual Meeting of the Institute of Journalists, when the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., preached in the morning on "Journalist and Preacher: Their Common Service to the Public," and in the evening on "Newspapers: How they may help and how they may hurt us." The morning sermon, under the title "Let there be Light," is published in the September number of the Mill Hill Pulpit. Passing from the text in Genesis i. to the thought of all who are promoters of light as being fellow-workers with God, the sermon speaks of the great function of the journalist as a bringer of light, to expose the evil and promote the good.

The journalist frankly disclaims the preacher's office. His address is to men as citizens of earth, and it is by earth's higher standards that he professes to try the acts and aims and methods of his rulers and his fellow-citizens. It is to their better instincts, to their common sense, that he makes appeal to ratify his condemnation or his praise.

And as there are preachers and preachers, the good and the bad, the able and the incapable, the hirelings and the sincere, so too has the Press its journalists of all sorts and conditions, differing as widely as possible in repute and in reality. And as the preachers are of many and opposite persuasions, oftentimes indignant one against the other, refuting each other's conclusions, and denouncing each other's doctrines, so are journalists of every party and opinion, and there is no conclusion which these deem firmly established but that others will be found to overthrow it.

But in both cases alike there are certain fundamental principles which all are under obligation to profess and proclaim, if they would obtain of the people the hearing and the support they seek.

The minister of religion, Catholic or Protestant, orthodox or heretic, preaches a Divine Being, Almighty Just and Good, and the obligation of His service, and the forgiveness of sins, and the life everlasting. The journalist, to whatever party he may belong, appeals to the law of reason and of right; he defends his own side and denounces his opponents in the name of the nation's honour and the people's good; distributes praise or blame on the grounds of well or ill doing.

Not by the church or party to which he belongs is either judged faithful to his high calling, but only by this that he faithfully adhere to and do strenuously maintain those principles which all churches and all parties profess.

IN THE INQUIRER of last October 27 we printed a note from Wordsworth's prose works on the beautiful Latin epitaph in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool. To give all the simplicity and depth of feeling of the original in an English translation would be difficult, but we should be grateful if it could be done. To suggest the attempt once more to our readers we will again print the Latin here :—

Abiit
Dilecta mea filia
Elisa!
Pulchra, Jucunda, Benigna,
Mea Filia abiit!
Ingenua perquam et perquam acuta
Bonis artibus et studiis honestis ornata
Sancta et Religiosa
Mea Filia abiit!
Vale, mea Elisa, vale!
Te diu desiderandam luget pater:
Desiderandam, sed, Deo Optimo gratias,
non amissam:
Nam veniet fel(i)cior ætas
Quando iterum, mea filia, te aspiciam,
Et tecum sempiterne vivam.

In cœlum placide migravit.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove announces sermons in connection with the Alfred Millenary, both morning and evening, at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Sept. 8, 15, and 22. The morning sermons will speak of Alfred as "Warrior," "Lawgiver and Reformer," and "Teacher of his People." The evening sermons are to deal with "What King Alfred taught his People," the special subjects for the three sermons being :—

"The Story of the World" and Record of its Troubles, by Orosius (A.D. 400).

"The Consolation of Philosophy" for Evil Times, by Boethius, Senator of Rome (A.D. 500).

"The Duty of a Pastor," by Pope Gregory the Great (A.D. 600).

Of these sermons Mr. Hargrove writes in his Chapel Record as follows :—

It is not without considerable hesitation that I have decided to devote three Sunday mornings to the memory of the great King, the thousandth year of whose death we shall presently be celebrating. As a rule such subjects have been taken for the evening, and I had indeed first put them down for evening lectures : but Alfred is no ordinary great man, he is indeed so much greater in character than any king we know of, that I feel constrained to urge his glory when my voice can prevail the most. And if three sermons on King David would be considered most devout and appropriate, three on a far greater and better monarch should surely be welcomed.

THE Rev. S. Farrington, who is to resume his ministry at Richmond, after holiday, on the 22nd inst., writes in the September "Calendar" of the Ormond-road Free Church, as follows :—

"During this month we shall be hearing much about King Alfred, who in all that constitutes true greatness stands pre-eminent among English kings. I hope to speak of him to you myself during some Sunday in the month. In the meantime I ask you to read and think over these reflections of his which I print below. They are from a book known as "The Consolations of Boethius," which he translated from Latin into English for the use of his people, with reflections and observations of his own."

A man never by his authority attains to virtue and excellence, but by reason of his virtue and excellence he attains to authority and power.

Ye need not take thought for power nor endeavour after it, for if ye are only wise and good it will follow you, even though ye seek it not.

Ye seek what ye cannot find when ye seek all that is good in one form of good.

Fools think that everybody is as blind as themselves, and that none can see what they themselves cannot.

Perhaps thou wilt say the good at times begin what they cannot bring to an issue ; but I say they always accomplish it. Though they may not always be able to bring to pass the deed, yet they have the full purpose, and the unwavering purpose is to be counted as an act performed, for it never fails of its reward here or in the next world.

A man's goodness and high heritage are rather of the mind than of the flesh.

True high birth is of the mind not of the flesh.

What a man most loves, that is his God.

To these selections Mr. Farrington adds the following famous words of the King himself :—"I have desired material for the exercise of government, that my talents and my power might not be forgotten and hidden away ; for every good gift and every power soon groweth old, and is no more heard of, if wisdom be not in them. Without wisdom no faculty can be fully brought out, for whatever is done unwisely cannot be counted as skill. To be brief, I may say that it hath ever been my desire to live honourably while I was alive, and after my death to leave to them that should come after me the memory of my good works." And also these appropriate lines from Wordsworth's "Happy Warrior" :—

Who comprehends his trust, and to the same
Keeps faithful with a singleness of aim ;
And therefore does not stoop, nor lie in wait
For wealth or honours, or for worldly state ;
Whom they must follow ; on whose head must fall,
Like showers of manna, if they come at all ;
Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,
Or mild concerns of ordinary life,
A constant influence, a peculiar grace ;
But who, if he be called upon to face
Some awful moment, to which Heaven hath joined Great issues, good or bad for human kind,
Is happy as a lover ; and attired
With sudden brightness, like a man inspired ;
And through the heat of conflict keeps the law
In calmness made, and sees what he foresaw.

To the September number of Harper Mr. Frederic Harrison contributes some "Reminiscences of George Eliot," telling of his first acquaintance with the great novelist in 1860, and of the help he was able to give in the matter of legal knowledge for the plot of Felix Holt, on a point of law in Daniel Deronda. The Attorney-General's opinion, printed in italics in Chapter XXXV. of Felix Holt, is from Mr. Harrison's pen. George Eliot's most interesting letters to Mr. Harrison are in the Life, and this article tells more of their occasion, giving particulars also of Mrs. Lewes's relations with the Positivist Society. At the end of his article Mr. Harrison gives us this little glimpse of one of the most compassionate and sympathetic of women :—

It must not be supposed that she was entirely wrapped up in deep problems of metaphysics and ethics. Far from it ! She was the most courteous and considerate of friends, delighting in lively conversation and good-natured gossip. She was an admirable housewife, and very proud of her practical accomplishments as a sensible and kindly mistress. She interested herself much in finding a comfortable situation for any young woman whom she judged to be in need of a friend. We have letters she addressed to my wife recommending a girl as nurse. "I have reason to believe," she wrote, "that her habits of feeling and conduct are much above the average in young women offering themselves for domestic service." The girl in question was leaving her place, as George Eliot suspected, owing to "a cabal against Mary in the kitchen as 'the proud housemaid.' Her underclothing was thought arrogantly good, and her bearing towards the men had a little too much dignity."

And having given another instance of her quick sympathy, Mr. Harrison concludes : "There was much of Dinah Morris that was studied, not from Aunt Samuel Evans, but from the depths of the heart of George Eliot herself."

THE current number of the Sunday Strand contains an interesting account of the well-known German artist, Heinrich Hofmann, with a number of illustrations of his pictures from the life of Christ—the preaching from the boat on the lake, Christ before Pilate, Gethsemane, the entombment, &c., while two corners of the Dresden Gallery are shown, with "Christ among the Doctors," and "The Woman taken in Adultery," in their place. There is also a portrait of the artist, which reminds one of Dr. Clifford. Hofmann is a native of Darmstadt, where he was born in 1824, and grew up in an ideal home. Düsseldorf, Antwerp, Paris, Munich, Rome, each in turn helped his artistic training, and, finally, having married an English wife in 1861, and spent the two first years at Darmstadt, he settled down at Dresden, which still remains his home. Ten years ago his wife was taken from him. Of his pictures of Christ Hofmann writes to Kathleen Schlesinger, the author of the article :—

I am glad to see from your letter that my unpretending pictures from the life of our Saviour have become so dear to you that you wish to write about them. You want to know something about my method of working and the origin of the pictures. Well, it is a well-known fact that a good picture is the result of putting the right colour on the right spot—what influences co-operate with this in the fancy and soul of the artist defy explanation and are hardly known to himself ; they differ in every work and in every artist. Enough that the work should speak for itself, the artist had best remain in the background. . . . I will, however, readily answer your question. For my pictures I have never used prototype or model for the features of Christ. Where should I find one that answers to the conception I have of Him ? When I read about Christ in the Bible, there arises spontaneously before my fancy a picture of Him which I try to retain and to reproduce —that is my only prototype.

The use of the word "fancy" instead of "imagination" in this letter is perhaps due to his translator and not to Hofmann himself. Hofmann is said to be a great lover of music, but Wagner's humour does not appeal to him, and he does not care for the later works of his great compatriot ; neither can he see anything in Turner ; but he thinks our National Gallery the finest in the world, because it contains only pictures of the first rank. So his interviewer reports.

THE September number of the Yr Ymofynydd contains some interesting articles. The first is a short notice of the Rev. John Thomas, of Llandyssul, one of our older ministers, in his pedagogic capacity, the master being pictured by an old pupil of sixty years ago ; an article follows on "The Great Need of the Age" ; the Rev. Priestley Evans continues his notes on "The Gains of the Century" ; the "Old Crow" recalls the rupture between the two Professors, Tait and Thomson, and notes other matters of interest. The review of Adams's "Christian Ethics," from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Lloyd Jones, B.A., B.D., is sure to attract attention. There is a good translation of Lewis Morris's poem, "The Two Voyages."

IN addition to the larger Catterick photographs, to which we have already called the attention of our readers, and copies of which may be seen at Essex Hall, we have been glad to receive from Mr. E. H. Coysh (110, Brighton-grove, Newcastle-on-Tyne), a very good cabinet photograph of the interior of Catterick Church.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

BY THE REV. TONY ANDRÉ, OF FLORENCE.*

WHILE scientific religious studies, freed from the fetters of dogma, have—during the century just ended—made magnificent progress in Protestant countries, there are few questions which have been less in favour in Italy. Men are afraid of meddling with them, or do not conceive it possible to disturb what has been fixed by tradition. Not that independent minds have been entirely wanting; to affirm that would be to forget men like Mazzini, Aurelio Saffi, Terenzio Mamiani; but these eminent men have constituted a very small minority, drowned, so to say, in the great mass, and hardly in touch with it at any point. I do not propose, however, to treat the subject historically, going back to the origin of the question; I confine myself to our contemporaries and to what is being done in our own day.

I must say at the outset that it is difficult to speak of a "movement" properly so-called, or at any rate the word must be taken in its most elastic sense; and, as everything is relative, we must call opinions "liberal" which would not seem very liberal in Northern lands, but constitute for Italy a real progress as compared with the current, and often terribly narrow, ideas.

I shall, however, point out to you several professors or authors of great worth, who do honour to their country, and are in perfect communion of thought with us. And if, on the other hand, I multiply names, it will be rather in order to win your interest and sympathy for some indications of progress that deserve encouragement. What matter if they are rich in promises for the future rather than productive at the present time! Everything must have a beginning; no one is better aware of this than you are.

And, as I should like to give a practical turn to these few pages, allow me also to point out to you what I believe to be the general causes—if not all the causes—of this torpor of religious thought.

I shall speak to you first of Liberalism in Protestant surroundings, afterwards of Liberalism among Catholics.

I.

It would seem that Protestants, being trained to religious liberty, should be, in Italy, as elsewhere, the pioneers of progress. I have, unhappily, to state that they remain in the rear—in this sense: that though their starting-point was far in advance of Catholic views, they have not moved, they have not advanced in freedom, they have not profited by the principles of their individualism. I am only acquainted with one single work conceived in a liberal spirit: I refer to the "Manual of Religious History for Schools and Families," published by Professor Ferdinando Bracciforti, a member of the Committee of this Council. It is a summary of the most beneficial lessons and the most edifying narratives of the Bible, without abstract dogmas and without legendary tales. The history is brought down to the official establishment of the Christian religion under Constantine. The fifth part, entitled "The Other Religions," teaches the scholars not to be exclusive, since the religious spirit has made itself felt everywhere, and on the other hand to appreciate Christianity more highly by understanding its great superiority.

The Waldensian Church.

If I have spoken of Signor Bracciforti's book as the only one, do not imagine that the Protestants publish nothing. On the contrary, they write a great deal, especially in the Waldensian Church. The Protestant printing-house at Florence, to name only one, issues religious works every year, for the most part of an edifying class, but including some theological and historical books. Among the latter, those of Professor Emilio Comba have an incontestable merit: Signor Comba is certainly, among the authors of our day, the one who writes with most authority of all that concerns Waldensian history. And beside him, in different departments, there is no lack of distinguished writers.

I cannot speak otherwise than with great sympathy of the Waldensian Church, in whose ranks I count many friends. It is active, well-organised, animated by excellent sentiments, and, of all the churches that are engaged in the evangelisation of Italy, it is certainly the most interesting and the best qualified to make the Gospel respected; but it remains firmly attached to the ideas of our ancestors, and even to-day the ordination of ministers is preceded by a doctrinal examination. "Thou dost promise" says, in addition to this, the Ordination Liturgy, "thou dost promise faithfully to teach the pure evangelical doctrine, revealed in the Sacred Scriptures of the Old and of the New Covenant, professed by our forefathers and summed up in our Confession of Faith." And further on: "In consequence of thy request for ordination and the solemn promise thou has just made, in consequence of thy examination in the faith and of thy certificates of study," &c. . . . "we now proceed to thy ordination."

It is the same in the other Churches, which work, each on its own account, for the evangelisation of Italy. It will be easily understood that they propagate orthodox ideas. The ministers who are in active work are sent into Italy by orthodox committees of foreign countries, especially by Scotch, English, and American committees, who naturally choose their men among those of whom they feel most sure from a dogmatic point of view. The congregation does not elect its own pastor, it accepts the one who is appointed. Only a few parishes, whose members succeed in defraying the expenses of their worship themselves, have the minister of their choice.

Italian Protestant Orthodoxy.

Am I obliged to conclude that the Italian Protestants subscribe to the traditional ideas without being convinced of their truth? Far from that. The conditions under which they live keep them in their current of ideas. The members of the churches are drawn mainly from the lower middle classes (la petite bourgeoisie) and from the poor. I repell, as a gratuitous calumny, the accusation of certain clericals, who say that money is paid to attract recruits. If the charity of Protestants stretches out a helping hand to all the unfortunate, including Catholics, it has never degenerated into a traffic in souls. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the poor and people of small means form the majority of all the congregations. This implies that they are to a large extent composed of persons unaccustomed to intellectual discussion. The new converts have recognised the superiority of Protestanism, and have accepted it; but as they previously felt the need of the priest's direction, so after conversion they still require an authority. The middle classes, on the other hand, are engrossed in business, which presents greater difficulties in Italy than in other countries; the economic conditions, though not so bad as is often stated, necessitate a constant struggle. Tradesmen earn little, schoolmasters still less; in all the other liberal professions competition is extremely keen; time and strength are absorbed by the question of daily bread. Where are they to find leisure to reflect on abstract problems?

Character of the Protestant Reaction.

On the other hand, in spite of the ground that has been gained since the establishment of liberty of worship, Protestantism in Italy is still in its stage of reaction against Catholicism, and struggles for its existence as much as for propagation, so that it is obliged, as I might almost say, to think more of its opponent than of itself. The sermons abound in controversy, and controversy leads the preachers to lay more and more stress, by way of contrast, on ecclesiastical doctrines, instead of emphasising the moral and vital elements of religion.

There are, it is true, some small signs of emancipation, but they are so slight that it is scarcely worth while to speak of them. I must not forget, however, to mention that the Waldensian School of Theology, the only one which is of any account in Italy, and which gives a complete and thorough teaching, admits certain points well established by modern criticism, principally in questions relating to the Old Testament. Nevertheless, this school remains the stronghold of the older orthodoxy, for the maintenance of which it forms the best prepared ministers.

As to the religious Press, if, leaving to each writer the responsibility of his own articles, it sometimes allows us to hear the clash of opinions, still it cannot accept what is contrary to its spirit. Why do we see so few theological discussions? Is it because the Orthodox have all the journals and all the reviews in their own hands? Or is it because the language of the Liberals would not be understood? I incline to the latter explanation, for if the number of Liberal writers were sufficient, and if they were sure of finding readers, they would certainly find a way of making their voice heard.

The picture I have drawn of Italian Protestantism would be desperate were we not convinced of the perfect good faith of both pastors and laity.

Foreign Protestant Churches.

We find, however, more independence of thought in the Foreign Churches established in the Peninsula. This is explained by the fact that the pastors have studied at Universities where religious criticism is freely practised, while on the other hand their hearers all possess a considerable degree of culture. The great advantage of these churches is that, though they all consider themselves orthodox, they are in no way creed-bound. If I may be permitted here to speak of my own Church, I would (first) observe that its aim is to provide for the religious needs of all Protestants, whoever they are. Six nationalities are at present represented. Further, according to its Statutes, "leaving it to God to read the hearts, it admits to its communion all who make a public profession of Christianity, and who desire to serve God, as He requires it, in spirit and in truth." And if the Church showed its disapproval, in 1831 and 1834, of two pastors who developed too energetically the doctrine of Original Sin, and in 1862 of a preacher who expressed in the pulpit his doubts concerning the bodily resurrection of Christ, it has never asked its ministers for doctrinal engagements or professions of faith; more than that, though a Reformed Church by its constitution, it has welcomed Lutheran pastors. In a word, it has always interested itself in the moral and vivifying side of religion, caring little for dissertations on dogmas, and still less for controversy.

And what I say of my own Church may also be said, in varying degrees, of all those in which the service is conducted in a foreign language. A broad and tolerant spirit prevails; and each language having, as a rule, only one place of worship in each town, and no administrative board with churches of the same language in the other cities, there is no conflict, and consequently no motive for a Church to attach itself officially to one party rather than to another.

LITERATURE.

THE COUNTRY PARISH.*

IN his new volume of essays Dr. Jessopp returns to his chosen field of research in which he has charmed us so often before. The first two essays on "Parish Life in England before the Great Pillage" and "The Parish Priest in England before the Reformation" respectively are careful studies of the religious life of the past. In a sense Dr. Jessopp is always a laudator temporis acti. He tells of departed glories and mourns over their loss, but in such a way as to fill us with the ambition that they may in some measure be restored to us. He combines the rôle of the chronicler and the preacher with singular success. "All the tendency of the feudal system, working through the machinery of the manorial courts, was to keep the people down. All the tendency of the parochial system, working through the parish council, holding its assemblies in the churches, where the people met on equal terms as children and servants of the living God and members of one body in Christ Jesus, was to lift the people up": this is the theme upon which Dr. Jessopp plays many variations. But we are in the hands of an historian who does not simply draw pictures from his own imagination. Behind this easy, popular, and at times almost bantering style there is the long labour of research. He has gone to the Record Office and ransacked parish registers with the enthusiasm which a man gives to his special hobby. The story which he transcribes is a very remarkable one, especially in regard to the wealth belonging to the mediæval parish and to the fact that all this wealth whether coming by way of gift or legacy was the property not of the clergy but of the people. It was in the strict sense parish property, vested in the community, and held in trust by the churchwardens for the time being for its benefit.

The property belonging to the parishes (Dr. Jessopp tells us) during the century before the great spoliation was enormous, and was always growing. It consisted of houses and lands; of flocks and herds; of precious jewels and costly vessels of silver and gold; of ornaments and church furniture; of bells and candlesticks, crosses and organs, and tapestry and banners; of vestments which were miracles of splendour in their colours and materials and incomparable finish of needlework; not to speak of the fine linen and the veils, the carpets and the hangings; and last, not least, the service books, which were continually needing to be mended, bound, or replaced by new copies, and that at a cost which we moderns even now find it difficult to accept as credible.

These gifts were made to the church by the poor equally with the rich. A poor widow's wedding ring was a common bequest to the church, very typical of the way in which religion appealed to the imagination and generosity of the people. What then became of this vast accumulation of parish property? The monasteries, chantries and collegiate churches had been spoiled to enrich the coffers of Henry VIII. It remained for Edward VI. to do the same for the parish churches of the land.

In three years it may be said that almost all the parish churches in England had been looted; before the end of the King's reign there had been a clean sweep of all that was worth stealing from the parish chests, or the church walls, or the church treasuries. In the next generation there were churches by the score that possessed not even a surplice; there were others that had not even a chalice; and others again in considerable numbers which were described as "ruinated."

This is what he means by the Great Pillage. The Puritans have borne too long the reproach of the wilful spoliation of the glories of our ancient parish churches. Apparently when the Puritan came greed had left very little for bigotry to spoil, with the exception of the glass and the sculpture in stone which could not be turned into money. There is an opinion very generally accepted that the Poor Law of Elizabeth's reign was rendered necessary by the disappearance of the monasteries, an opinion based of course upon the belief that in the Middle Ages the monastery was the great dispenser of charitable relief. Dr. Jessopp combats this idea with great emphasis. There is, perhaps, a little too much absoluteness in his tone; but this may well be forgiven in a plea for an important and forgotten truth. "It is nonsense," he tells us, "it is absolutely contrary to fact, to say that it was owing to the suppression of the monasteries that new devices were resorted to to save the poor from starving. Pauperism came in, not by the suppression of the monasteries, but by the disendowment of the parishes."

In a later essay, entitled "The Cry of the Villagers," our attention is diverted from the parish of long ago to the agricultural population of to-day. We do not know whether this essay was intended originally for a meeting of the Christian Social Union. In its fine social enthusiasm and its firm grip of realities it is admirably suited for the purpose. It is a plea for the recognition of the fact that Hodge has his needs and his claims upon social service no less than the dwellers in city slums. Whole districts are tending to fall out of cultivation. The old village life has all but disappeared. The young people drift away to the towns. Dwellings are bad. The conveniences of life are sorely lacking. And still all the charity, all the big schemes of philanthropy go to the towns. Dr. Jessopp apparently has confidence that if any large benefactor like Lord Iveagh or the Peabody Trustees would come to the rescue of the peasant much might still be done to restore the village community as an integral part of English life. The problem is urgent, and pregnant with much wider issues than many of the busy dwellers in town are aware. No nation can be really prosperous unless a large part of its population find happiness and contentment in tilling the soil. This is an essential principle in all sound thinking upon the social problem; but it has still to make its appeal to the imagination of the philanthropist and the reformer.

DR. ABBOTT'S "DIATESSARICA." *

WITH amazing acuteness and an industry that never tires, Dr. Abbott pursues his criticism of the Gospels. Students of his new article in the "Encyclopædia Biblica" will get a general view of the whole question as it now presents itself to his mind. In his last volume, "The Corrections of Mark," which appears as Part II. of the series entitled "Diatessarica," he discusses some of the differences between the form of the Common Tradition in Mark and the corresponding passages in Matthew and Luke. His previous work, entitled "Clue,"† endeavoured to establish the conclusion that parts of the Synoptic Gospels are based on translations from a Hebrew document. The present volume applies this theory to explain the corrections which Matthew and Luke have made on the common original contained in Mark. The student will find here most valuable collections of material, handled with unceasing suggestiveness. There is the trained scholar's sense of the niceties of Greek; there is a fruitful use of the Septuagint; there is a wide range of illustration. And yet, to speak frankly, the general result is not convincing. Dr. Abbott succeeds in showing that if certain Hebrew words stood in the original, and certain corruptions took place, the Greek corrections may be explained. But his thesis really seems to require that this should not only be one method of accounting for the phenomena in question, but that it is also the most likely one. Other changes took place on other grounds. Some of these may have operated independently in the cases selected. Thus, can we really believe that the same expression was translated by one Evangelist as "a (or, the) Son of God," but by another as "a righteous person"? (p. 132). Or, again, is it justifiable to assume for the original story of the transfiguration the Hebrew phrase "the skin of his face shone"? Moreover, the amount of corruption required in the Hebrew original seems very surprising in so short a time. It is difficult to account for it, except on the hypothesis of a rapid multiplication of copies, and of copies of copies, of which there is no evidence. And sometimes the theory seems to require the choice of an unusual Hebrew form for a common one. Thus the transition from Mark viii. 12, "why doth this generation," to Matt. and Luke, "an evil generation," is explained by a confusion of the Hebrew originals of "why" and "evil." But that involves the use of the relatively rare participle "evil-doing" in place of the common adjective. A glance at the usage of the participle in the Old Testament, with the help of the Concordance, seems to make this improbable.

Again, Mark viii. 12, "Verily I say (lit.) if there shall be given a sign to this generation" is represented in Matt. and Luke by "a sign shall not be given to it except the sign of Jonah." The phrase "verily I say" (without "unto you") is unusual. Dr. Abbott supposes that "verily" (with a peculiar spelling) and "I say" were each in turn derived from corruptions of the Hebrew "if there shall be given," and then were all run together, so that the same Hebrew is used three times over. Further he explains "except" by the help of Mark's "if" and the Hebrew equivalent of "that" after the verb "said." But he forgets that the combination "that if" only means "except" when a negative has preceded; hence "he said that If, &c." could not be interpreted as "except." Finally, the entry of Jonah has to be accounted for (Jonah in Hebrew means "dove"). Accordingly, with an unfortunate and doubtless inadvertent word-play, Dr. Abbott writes:—"The word 'except' might suggest to many Christians the exceptional sign from heaven given at Christ's baptism in the descent of a dove." "Dove," then, was written in the margin, and finally pulled into the reported speech of Christ in the shape of Jonah! On the whole we cannot think that Dr. Abbott's main thesis is aided by this kind of support. It was he who gave the unquestionable proof of the priority of Mark. But what is true for the whole cannot always be applied successfully to every detail of the part. Nevertheless, all students will find material here deserving thoughtful consideration, and the spectacle of Dr. Abbott's devoted labour is always stimulating. It is to be hoped that the promised commentary on Mark and its parallels may soon be ready.

SHORT NOTICES.

In The Christian in Hungarian Romance Mr. John Fretwell, whose enthusiasm for Hungary and things Hungarian is well known, tells the story of Jokai's "Egy az Isten," to which allusion is also made in an extract from the Rev. Alexander Gordon's Transylvanian Report, printed in this week's leading article. The hero of the story is Adoryan, a Transylvanian Unitarian of Toroczko, and we can well believe that the novel is of thrilling and romantic interest, for Jokai appears to be a writer of astonishing fertility and imaginative power; but we cannot pretend to have been specially attracted by Mr. Fretwell's sketch. There are, however, some interesting notes in the introduction, dealing with the fortunes of Unitarianism in Hungary. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 3s.)

The Messiahship of Shakespeare, sung and expounded by Clelia. Clelia's theory is that "Shakespeare creates artistically the religion that the Professor (the late Sir John Seeley) sketches speculatively," and he maintains that this religion is preached by means of symbolism in the Sonnets, the Tempest, the Winter's Tale and Cymbeline.

This is at least more interesting than the attempt to find occult proofs that Bacon was the great dramatist. There is, indeed, something alluring in the idea that Coleridge's "myriad minded" man rose supreme above the limitations of his age, and consciously anticipated a refined religion which was to appear at the end of the nineteenth century. The essence of this religion is, in Clelia's view, a synthesis of Christianity and "Hellenism," and the spirit of the religion characterises all the great modern teachers, Emerson, Ruskin, &c. Truth, Beauty, and Goodness are the Trinity in the One God, the Ideal—that is the modern doctrine which Shakespeare enshrined in symbolic forms.

Let who will find symbolism in Shakespeare's more ethereal works. Doubtless there is more of it there than the ordinary eye sees. And certainly an ingenious and well-versed interpreter (such as Clelia) will always find much to say for himself, however fantastic his readings may seem to be. But Clelia is more than a literary interpreter; he is a pseudo-orthodox theologian who believes in the second coming of Christ; only he believes that Christ came the second time—in Shakespeare. "Now in Shakespeare's Ideal of Beauty, Truth and Morality in one, is involved the reconciliation of Hellenism (Beauty and Truth) with Hebraism (Morality). Art and science become as incumbent on the conscience, as much religious duties, as morality. And as Christ, at his first coming a carpenter, at his second coming was a play-actor, the theatre of Shakespeare becomes as sacred as the Church of Christ and one with it"—(p. 66).

The last sentence of this extract, if quoted alone, would probably suggest to the reader thoughts of the madhouse. But such thoughts may be repressed. Clelia's pleas all tend one way—that indicated by the first part of the extract. But why does he identify Shakespeare with Christ and give him Messiahship? Perhaps for Clelia both the great dramatist and Christ obtain by this means a new glory and authority—that seems to be his idea. But it is to be feared that this gospel will win no disciples, and that it may cast into the shade of contemptuous neglect the interpretations to which Clelia has chosen to tack it. Gwersi ar Fywyd Jesu, &c.; or, "Lessons on the Life of Jesus as recorded in St. Luke's Gospel." This is Part II. of the Lessons, and is intended for the use of our Welsh Sunday-schools during 1901-02. As in Part I., already noticed, the editorial duties have been admirably discharged by the Rev. William James, B.A., of Llandyssul, who is also responsible for eight out of the twenty lessons. The responsibility for the other twelve is divided between eight different writers. This division of labour may relieve the editor, but it does not secure uniformity of standpoint. There is no material difference perhaps, and on the whole the work is exceedingly well done. The lessons are more up to date than anything else of the kind in the Welsh language. Difficulties are fairly confronted and not glossed over; whether they are always satisfactorily solved may be open to question. We heartily commend these "Gwersi" to the notice of all such as can read Welsh, and hope they may have a speedy sale. Copies may be obtained from Mr. J. D. Lewis, printer, Llandyssul. Price ninepence, free by post.

STRAUSS AND LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AT ZÜRICH.

I have perused with special interest the paper read by Professor Edouard Montet to the International Council on May 31, which appeared in The Inquirer of Aug. 17. Having watched closely the development of liberal religion in Switzerland for many years, I was doubly interested to read such a clear and succinct account of the various stages of the progress of rational Christianity, especially in the canton of Zürich.

I trust Professor Montet will excuse me if I point out an inaccuracy in his statement about Dr. Strauss in his relation to the University of Zürich. I was living at Zürich in 1839, when the Council of Education appointed Dr. Strauss to the chair of theology, but the appointment had to be cancelled in obedience to the will of the majority. As soon as the decision of the Council was known, violent opposition arose against the Government, of which the Council of Education formed a part. From 1830, when compulsory education was first introduced in the canton of Zürich, up to 1839, there was a decided majority of Progressives in all Government departments; but gradually the Evangelical party took fright, the clergy in some of the town parishes, and more especially in country districts, warned their flocks, telling them that religion was being taken away from them, &c. On Sept. 6 a regular insurrection took place, masses of people who had marched from their homes through the night, some even led by their pastors, barricaded Government House and forced the Council to abdicate. A new Government was elected, consisting mostly of Evangelicals and Conservatives. Dr. Strauss's appointment had to be cancelled, and many important posts were filled by Conservatives, who for several years were called anti-Straussians, though the question about Strauss formed only one item in the widespread dissatisfaction with the rapid advances that had been made in many departments from 1830-39.

Up to 1847 the leaders did all in their power to retard progress, the political atmosphere was much disturbed, estrangement took place between many who formerly had worked together harmoniously. But then union was restored out of evil came good: the Zürichers, like one man, took part with those of the Roman Catholic cantons, who aimed at the expulsion of the Jesuits from Switzerland; and all the other Protestant cantons uniting, the desired end was attained.

When next the chair of theology became vacant, a professor of liberal views was elected, progress was again discernible in all departments, and now, as Professor Montet says, "liberal Protestantism is brilliantly represented at Zürich University," and the liberal Protestants are rendering signal service in all departments of philanthropy. DERWENTWATER PRESERVATION.

SIR,—Some correspondents have written to me asking if the list is closed for contributions to the purchase of the Brandlehow Estate: they had seen it stated that the full sum had been already obtained. Will you allow me through your columns to say that this is not so? £5,200 has been raised or promised, but the purchase price is £6,500, and the National Trust are anxious to raise £7,000, in order to meet all initial expenses and have a balance to invest towards the up-keep of the property. The purchase money must be raised before the middle of October, and as nothing succeeds like success, it is pleasant to record that the committees in Keswick, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and Birmingham are still at work, and are determined, if possible, that this beautiful lake in its undisturbed tranquility and charm shall not be lost to the nation. Thus far Keswick has raised £650, Manchester £600, Liverpool £250, Leeds £145, Birmingham £50. The rest has been subscribed by lovers of the English Lakes in all parts. One of the encouraging features of the work of collection has been the letters which have come to hand with small sums from quite poor people who are interested. A mill girl wrote me yesterday, saying that she had seen the scheme in the papers and had asked her mother and her sister to help and begged to enclose three shillings, with a hope that the scheme would succeed. A poor lady clerk from London sent five shillings anonymously by the same post, saying she had just returned so refreshed in mind and body by a sight of the English Lake scenery that she felt she must subscribe her mite towards the enterprise. Already five people out of the nine needed have generously come forward with £100 to accept the challenge of "Stroller" in The Spectator; two donors have sent £60 for the purchase of an acre out of the 108 we intend to obtain. One desires the gift to be looked upon as a memorial to her father. The time is short; therefore, let all who care to have a share in the privilege of obtaining this priceless boon for future generations send what help they can before the end of September.

Donations should be sent to Miss Octavia Hill, 190, Marylebone-road, London; or to the Secretary, National Trust, 1, Great College-street, Westminster; or to myself.

MIGHTY men we are told they were, mighty men who walked with God, and in the last clause lies the secret of the first; men who lived in the spirit, men who followed after the real life instead of giving all time and attention to the mere external, men who lived in the higher stories of their being, and not continually in the basements.—Ralph Waldo Trine.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Via, Veritas, Vita," the Hibbert Lectures by the Rev. Dr. Drummond.

PEOPLE sometimes, in their anxiety to do honour to Christ, speak as though it would reduce him to the level of mean and common men to regard him simply as a teacher, though that was his characteristic title when he was on earth. But if he was a solitary explorer in the realms of spirit, as Newton was in the realms of nature, and gathered up into a few grand announcements the partial truths of his predecessors, and if these announcements lived on, and became the bread of life to millions of souls, this alone would suffice to place him on a supreme eminence, and entitle him to the grateful veneration of mankind, even though the truth, when once proclaimed, assumed an independent energy, and took its place, like the law of gravitation, among the inalienable possessions of the world; and if it be said that this view would make him "a mere man," I must confess my inability to attach any precise, and still more any derogatory, meaning to that phrase, so undefined are the limits of human possibility, so akin is genius to divine creativeness, so intimately may the life of God blend with our humanity. In every man in whom the heavenly fire has been kindled, the two natures blend in the indissoluble harmony of a single person; and if the will were entirely surrendered, and never jarred against the will of God, the Divine Spirit would be continually manifested in the midst of human limitations, some divine thought would be expressed through the perennial activity of a human life. "A mere man," therefore, if we understand the phrase, not in some vulgar and irreverent fashion, but in the sense of pure and absolute man—man, according to the Divine ideal of him—is a being of unfathomable greatness, who, instead of dragging down our minds to what is earthly and common, lifts them to the Father from whom he has been born, and whose eternal life he manifests, even as the dewdrop may exhibit in its tiny sphere the splendour of the sun.

The Word made flesh discloses to us, not some particular truth or requirement, but the very spirit and character of God, so far as we are able to apprehend it; for the Divine Thought is God Himself passing into self-manifestation, just as our speech is our own personality entering into communication with others. When, therefore, the Christian, in his anxiety to know more of God, turns wistfully to his Master, he thinks not so much of what Christ has told him, as of what he has shown. This is the message which Christ has delivered to the world, that "God is love." But then, what is love? How can we know it, and enter into the depth and richness of its meaning, unless we see it, and feel its warmth upon our hearts, and are taken home, forgiven and reconciled, to its bosom? Had Christ merely spoken about it as a theologian's dream, while its power was absent from his life, we should have been little the wiser; but in the fulness of his communion with God he lived it, and proved its reality through uttermost self-sacrifice. It is thus that he has become the beloved Saviour and Comforter of souls which are conscious of sin, because this supreme Word of God to man has become flesh in him, and been manifested in the joys and sorrows, the struggles, the suffering, and the triumph of a human life.

But if in this human image is portrayed the Divine Thought which returns into the bosom of the Father and declares His paternal love towards men, no less was Christ a tabernacle for God's Thought of what mankind, morally and religiously, should be. As a great artist fixes his ideal upon the canvas, and introduces through the eyes of responsive and interpreting minds an exalted beauty and a depth of spiritual expression that no description could ever convey through the ears, so God has set before us in Christ a spirit of life, revealing to us, in the unity of its manifold perfection, that Divine ideal of righteousness of which the most elaborate law can be nothing more than a description. In this way Christ is an end of the Law, for, having seen the Divine Word in him, we pass behind the word of the statute-book, and hold immediate communion with eternal righteousness; and God no longer imposes on us a commandment the letter of which we must obey, but sends into our hearts the spirit of His Son, and invites us to live out of the resources of that spirit. If we seek for a name for this spirit it is the same as we have already found in the higher sphere. If love is the essential life of the Father, it ought to be the essential life of the children; and this is the Word which has not only been made flesh in Christ, but, though it is still waiting for an ampler realisation, has been wrought through him into the fabric of human society.

The fragmentary records of Christ's life have little to satisfy an idle curiosity, and their artless and popular style and varying accounts invite the criticism of the learned; but all the more brightly do they reveal what we want to know, the character of a soul, and we receive from their perusal a distinct impression of a wonderful and exalted personality, which becomes ever after the haunting ideal of our lives. But this ideal can display itself through an endless variety of forms both of intellect and action, and instead of restraining any of our natural gifts, it pervades them all as with a breath of holy energy, and consecrates them to unselfish ends. Here, then, we rest; not primarily in the Church, nor in the letter of Scripture, but in the lowly Son of Man have we seen the Word of God, full of grace and truth; and hiding this Divine Thought in our hearts, we would make it the secret force of our activity, and, whatever may be our pursuits, rise into fellowship with Christ in the reverent worship of God and the loving service of mankind.

WE publish this week a first instalment of the two lectures on "The Mediæval Chronicler in England," given by the Rev. E. I. Fripp in Manchester College, in connection with the summer meeting of University Extension Students at Oxford. After giving these lectures, Mr. Fripp proceeded to Marburg, where he lectured to another holiday school on "Chief Writers of the Eighteenth Century" (in England), and had a most interesting class of about fifty school-masters and mistresses, of at least half-a-dozen nationalities. The lectures were in English.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Thousand Years Ago.

I.

This month, in the city of Winchester, an assembly is to be held to celebrate the memory of our Saxon King, Alfred the Great. A thousand years ago he sometimes made his home there. It was his habit to move his Court from place to place that he might learn to know the people in the different parts of his kingdom; but it is certain that he spent an important part of his life in Winchester, and there he died and was buried. It was in his palace in Winchester that the wonderful old chronicle, which he caused to be written, first took shape. It is now to be seen in the library of Corpus Christi College in Cambridge, written in the clear Saxon characters of those far-away days, and is the oldest manuscript of the earliest history that any nation in Europe possesses written in its own tongue.

We may think of Alfred in Winchester, too, making and carrying out his plans for the improvement of his ignorant people; grieving over the fact that the boys and girls of Wessex could neither read nor write; and gathering learned men about him to help him to translate books for the use of his subjects. When Alfred came to the throne there was only one long poem and some battle songs in the language of the people; and persons who attend the Winchester assembly will remember gratefully that we owe to King Alfred the beginning of the grand English literature which has grown up since his time.

I fancy some children, if they were asked what Alfred did for England, would reply at once, "Oh, he conquered the Danes." That is true; but we owe much more to him than his conquests of England's invaders; and it is a wonderful thing to bear in mind that from a thousand years back there come to us not only the record of the brave deeds of King Alfred, but the record also of the grandeur of his character and the influence of his goodness over the people among whom he lived.

Why do we call him "the Great"? Some of his own words give an answer to this question: "I have tried to live worthily while I lived, and after my life to leave to the men who come after me a remembering of me in good works." A great life begins in boyhood and girlhood; and Alfred, even when he was a young Prince, began to live worthily. There are two or three stories concerning him which tell us this. Here is one. Alfred was King Ethelwulf's youngest son, and after his father died his brothers took possession unfairly of lands and treasures that should have fallen to his share.

There were plenty of advisers in those rude times to urge the young Prince, who was their favourite among the late King's sons, to insist on his rights. The West Saxons called Alfred "England's darling," and numbers of them would have gladly fought for him. What did he do? He gave up the treasure he should have inherited, rather than have a dispute which would have ended in fighting against his brothers; he would not set the people of the land the bad example of quarrelling.

We all know that our lives are great and good, or mean and poor, because of the choice we make as to what we will think, and say, and do. Every day and every hour we have, each of us, to choose between a better course and a worse course. And so, a thousand years ago, Alfred had to choose. But it was no easy task to live worthily in those days. Think what kind of people he lived among. Most of them were coarse and rough—good fighters, and nothing more—just what frequent wars against the Danes had made them. They had forgotten all the arts of peace.

Yet what sort of a man, notwithstanding these uncouth surroundings, did Alfred resolve to become? He had learned to wrestle, and hunt, and fight, and was famous as a youth because he was so strong and brave; but he had higher aims than these. We are told that when he was a boy he was greatly troubled because there was no one in his father's kingdom who could teach him Latin. Even in those early days he wanted to fill his mind with grand thoughts, and he carried about him constantly a little book in which he wrote sentences that seemed to him worth remembering, and these sentences he used to learn by heart, and think over them till they became a part of himself.

When he came to the throne Alfred made up his mind as to what things were worth having in life. The next requisite was to carry out his thought into deeds. It is easy to see why he longed for peace: there was not a peasant child in his kingdom who could read, and the young king knew what education might do for his people. Now, then, remember how he cast aside the chance which opened before him of winning back for himself the lands which had belonged to his grandfather, King Egbert; how he settled down contentedly in his own little kingdom, resolved to make it a centre of good influence to other lands in Europe. See how he invited clever craftsmen and husbandmen to establish themselves among the West Saxons that his rough fighting peasants might learn some better occupation than warfare. Because there was peace in the land he could send for teachers and learned men, and could call the children into schools and translate books for them and their parents. Thus he changed the face of his little kingdom and changed too the habits and character of the people. Because he was so good and wise he became an example to the nation, and every one looked to King Alfred as the pattern of what he himself ought to be.

There was a King with a grand character, and he lived a thousand years ago. And we in this month of September, 1901, are celebrating his memory. Does not this teach us something about the power of human influence and how it endures? It is like the writing upon the rock that lasts for ages. It has been truly said that when Alfred lived "the world was like a rough schoolboy fond of fighting, who had not learned to love law and order"; yet he set the example of one who loved law and order, and his people learned to copy his example. What good qualities he had! Courage and industry, perseverance, and love of knowledge, and beneath them all a deep religious spirit of prayer and trust, so that it was said of him by his friend Asser, the old chronicler, "On his doings shone the light of God."

"Govern thyself by law," said Alfred when he was dying, to his son who was to succeed him on the throne. And this is one of the wise sayings of Alfred the Great that we shall all do well to obey.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Sir,—May I venture to make a further appeal for assistance for our children who have been enjoying their holidays in the country during this summer. A large number have been sent away and the expenses became heavier each year from the increasing difficulty of finding suitable homes near London. There is a distinct advantage in placing the children quite away in the country, and it is sincerely hoped that a slight addition in the cost of the railway fare will not make it impossible to arrange for them to be sent to these more desirable parts. For several years our subscriptions have not quite covered expenses, though the considerable balance in hand from previous years has met the deficit. This year, however, unless a few more kind friends will help us, I am afraid we shall more than exhaust this fund and have nothing to carry forward for next par.

I acknowledge with many thanks the following subscriptions sent during August:—Mrs. Buckton, £1 1s.; Mrs. Harrop White, £1 1s.; Mrs. Hunter, £1; Mr. Crompton, £1; Mrs. F. Nettlefold, £1 1s.; Mr. Colfox, £10; E.D.G., 5s.; Mrs. A. Lawrence, £1; A Friend, £10; Rev. H. Solly, 5s. And I earnestly trust a few more gifts may be sent to enable us to carry on the work without difficulty.

UNITARIAN VISITORS TO GLASGOW EXHIBITION.

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to again call the attention of those of your readers who mean to visit our International Exhibition here to the difficulty of getting lodgings at reasonable rates. Owing to September and October being the season of congresses and conferences this difficulty is increasing rather than diminishing; and our church committee has resolved to continue our offer of assistance for other two months. Mr. Collins and myself will retain our list of rooms, and visitors will favour us by giving as long notice of their coming as possible. It may be of interest to state that we have been the means of accommodating nearly 150 Unitarian visitors with rooms, and have given what other assistance has been in our power. We have heard of no disappointments, and have been amply rewarded by the appreciation of our efforts that has invariably been expressed. It has also been a pleasure to us to welcome to our services the large number of friends who have been with us, and we hope to have the presence of many more during this and next month.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIAN CHURCH.

WE publish to-day some record of the first part of a visit which is being paid to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary by a company of our friends, under the leadership of Miss TAGART, who forty-three years ago accompanied her father, the Rev. EDWARD TAGART, on that first visit of sympathy made by a representative of the Unitarians of England to Transylvania. Mr. TAGART went as secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on a journey immeasurably more arduous than it is now, and to that service he sacrificed his life. That his visit is not forgotten by the present generation of the Unitarians of Hungary, a touching incident at Budapest has shown.

The Hungarian Church looks back for its origin to the declaration of religious liberty by JOHN SIGISMUND, Prince of Transylvania, at the Diet of Torda in 1568, and to FRANCIS DAVID, the first Unitarian bishop, who in 1579 sealed his fearless testimony by a martyr death in prison. Since that day the Church has endured much persecution, but only for the proving of its faith and the awakening of fresh energies in devoted service. The violent persecutions of the eighteenth century were not repeated in the nineteenth; but in the middle of last century, in face of the fresh uprising of the Hungarian people, the Austrian Government made an insidious attempt to strike at the heart of the Unitarian community.

The order was issued that no school or college should be allowed to exist without a certain endowment for adequate maintenance, the standard being fixed at what was judged to be beyond the resources of the Unitarians. But through the interest of Mr. JOHN PAGET, an old York student of Manchester College, who was settled in Transylvania, the urgent need for help was made known to the Unitarians of England and America, and sufficient funds to save the colleges were quickly raised. It was in connection with this effort that Mr. TAGART made his journey, and from that time the bonds of brotherly union between our people and the Hungarian churches have been more and more closely drawn, and particularly through the presence of a succession of Hungarian students at Manchester College.

In the late summer of 1868 the Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER paid a visit to Transylvania, in order to be present at the celebration of the three-hundredth anniversary of the proclamation of religious liberty at Torda, and the account of his visit, which he contributed to the Theological Review of January, 1869, together with a report of a subsequent visit made in 1879 by the Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON in connection with the tercentenary of the death of FRANCIS DAVID, furnish a vivid picture of the condition of the Hungarian churches, and bring very close to our sympathies the religious life of that distant people. Towards a knowledge of their present problems and aspirations the most recent contribution we have received was in the welcome papers by Professor GEORGE BOROS and the Rev. N. JOZAN, read at the meeting of the International Council in Whitweek.

At the chief service at Torda, in the commemoration at which Mr. TAYLER was present, the preacher was the Rev. JOSEPH FERENCZ, at that time Professor of Theology at Kolozsvár, who eight years later was to succeed Bishop KRIZA as head of the church. Mr. TAYLER, having given an account of the sermon, tells of what followed in this passage, eloquent of profound feeling :—

> At the close of the sermon, there was a celebration of the Lord's Supper. I think nearly the whole of the congregation partook of it; the men first, and afterwards the women. It was a simultaneous expression of rejoicing, that they had survived with faith and hope unbroken centuries of suffering and persecution, and had come by God's good providence to the quiet safety and freedom of that hour. It was a touching scene. I never before felt, as I did then, the holy beauty and deep spiritual significance of the few simple symbols which universal Christendom has associated with this expressive rite. There I stood in the front row of the communicants by the side of my countryman, Mr. Paget, unable of course to understand the words that were so earnestly uttered by the officiating minister, but attuned to seriousness by the quaint old melody that pealed forth from the organ and was chanted by the choir—by the cup and the bread that were circulating around me, brought into silent sympathy with that faithful people of God who had clung to their honest convictions in defiance alike of the threats and the allurements of the world—and carried back by reminiscences irresistibly borne in upon me, into a communion of the inmost spirit with that innumerable company of saints and confessors who in divers ages and widely severed lands, had through these same symbols given up their souls to God and devoted themselves to works of self-sacrificing love. I could not suppress the hope that the time might come in our own country, when the members of different communions, in spite of their doctrinal differences, could meet occasionally to strengthen the bonds of Christian brotherhood, by celebrating in the presence of their common symbol, the Cross, a common feast of holiness and love.

The services which Mr. GORDON attended in 1879 were not less moving. From Kolozsvár to Keresztúr, where the FRANCIS DAVID celebration was to take place, he made a kind of triumphal progress, so picturesque were the observances and so warm the welcome everywhere accorded to the English visitor. Of what he experienced at Toroczkó, one of the places on the route, Mr. GORDON tells as follows :—

> Toroczkó was the one place in Transylvania of which I had a distinct impression. I knew it from the powerful romance of Maurice Jókai, "Egy az Isten" (God is One), the reading of which had beguiled the long hours of my railway and steamboat travel. The little mining town, which nestles beneath the awful shadow of the Székely-kö (Szekler Stone), is built around a large open square, in the centre of which rises the gilded spire of the Unitarian Church. This is the church whose bell, according to Jókai, has no Calvinism about it, but rings out ever, with brave single strokes, the Unitarian Creed, "One! One! One! One!" To this building, the only house of worship in Toroczkó, the Rural Dean conducted us, and it was speedily filled by the members of his flock. I was compelled to say a few words, but my emotions almost mastered me. Presently the organ pealed, and the whole body of people with one united voice broke out into the strain of Luther's mighty hymn, singing in resonant Magyar the version by Francis Dávid, which they love so well: Erös várunk nékünk az Isten ("Our fortress strong, for us 'tis God"). Then, indeed, I was fairly melted down with a new and indescribable sense of the power of our religion. That the faith of our fathers was here no bare speculation, but a living fire in the heart of a free people, was borne into my mind with a force and majesty of impression of which I could have had no previous idea.

During the present week our friends have been at Kolozsvár, and it is delightful to know with what open-hearted hospitality they are being entertained by our Hungarian brethren. They will see many things to interest and to stir their deepest sympathies, in contact with an heroic people, who have suffered much for liberty and for religion. At the conclusion of his report Mr. GORDON considers what reasons may be given for the remarkable continuance during more than three centuries of the heretical Church in Transylvania, and having referred to the influence of race, and the presence from time to time of other monotheisms in the country, concludes as follows :—

The Hungarian Unitarian community has a powerfully compact and, at the same time, a highly elastic system of church order. It is an organisation which cannot help respecting itself and being respected. This is a body worth belonging to; free, autonomous, and yet a solid living reality, pervaded by great principles. Persecution has done much to keep aglow the fire of its zeal; but persecution might have been only too effective had not the community presented the resistance of a masculine organism in which all constituent souls were "members one of another."

In these considerations I say nothing of the possession of Truth, or the providential hand of God. These are causes which will necessarily be taken into account, and to which, of course, all other agencies are subsidiary. Nevertheless, such agencies are neither unimportant nor uninstructive. In the outset, the Unitarian movement was fostered by princes and utilised by statesmen, to be flung aside and hunted down so soon as its radically emancipating character became fully apparent. Yet the movement, rooted from the first in the conscience of a people, could not be killed, and did not die. Princes perish, and statesmen fail; the devotion of earnest and united men abides. After long and sore trials, valiantly borne, the Hungarian Unitarian Church rejoices at length in the assured victory of faith and freedom. Her spirit has triumphed, her cause is honoured, her witness is felt. "The hills stand about Jerusalem: even so standeth the Lord round about His people, from this time forth for evermore."

THE HUNGARIAN TOUR.

A FORTNIGHT ago we reported the setting out, on Friday, Aug. 23, of a party of about thirty travellers, under the leadership of Miss Tagart, President of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union, on a visit to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary. The list of travellers we have since received comes to just thirty, among the ladies, in addition to Miss Tagart, being Miss E. M. Lawrence, Miss Lister, and Miss Teschemacher. The gentlemen number seventeen, with Mr. W. H. Shrubsole as leader, the ministers of the party being the Revs. E. S. Anthony, T. B. Broadrick, T. Dunkerley, W. J. Davies, W. Harrison, E. Ceredig Jones, S. Gardner Preston, and T. P. Spedding.

We have received from a friend, whom we asked to send us a chronicle of the journey, the following notes :—

HUNGARIAN TRAVEL NOTES.

Under the happiest auspices and with bright anticipations, our party of nearly 30 left Holborn Viaduct on Friday, Aug. 23, on their long journey to Transylvania. The sea passage to Flushing proved to be unusually calm, and was in consequence very enjoyable. After a night in the train we next morning reached Dresden, the delightful capital of Saxony. The place proved so attractive that an additional day was spent there, so that our friends were able to visit the world-famous Picture Gallery, the Museum, and many other places of interest in the neighbourhood. In continuing our journey on Monday the first two or three hours were passed very pleasantly as the train followed the course of the Elbe through the country generally known as Saxon Switzerland. The conspicuous, detached, generally wooded, hills and rock masses, many of which are weathered into most picturesque shapes, did not fail to impress the travellers with their beauty, and as the train followed the windings of the river, with its pleasure and mercantile life in full view, the weariness of the journey to Vienna was much relieved. On reaching the Austrian capital we found our friend, the Rev. N. Jozan, waiting for us, and he gave us a very hearty welcome. During our short stay in Vienna Mr. Jozan did everything that was possible to enable us to see what was worth seeing, and when we left on Thursday we had pleasant recollections of the National Gallery, with its splendid collection of pictures, the Natural History Museum, the public parks and other places of interest; whilst some will not forget the performance of Wagner's Lohengrin at the Grand Opera House. Mr. Jozan's attentions were without ceasing, and the visit to Vienna will always be associated in our minds with the services which he rendered to us.

On Thursday afternoon we left for Budapest, and in about an hour crossed the Hungarian frontier. Travelling east, the scenery became more interesting, and as we ran along the left bank of the Danube for many miles we very much enjoyed the comparatively short journey to Budapest. On our arrival at the railway-station we were very heartily welcomed to Hungary by Dr. Erödi, on behalf of the Carpathian Club, and by young Mr. Szekeley, on behalf of the Budapest Church. Mr. Shrubsole suitably acknowledged the kindly greetings with which we had been received. During these proceedings our friends and we were in such numbers that we created some sensation in the busy station.

Friday and Saturday were devoted to visiting the national collection of pictures, natural history and antiquities, and many other places of interest. On the Friday the Carpathian Club entertained us to a sumptuous lunch on the island of St. Margaret, and on Saturday we were entertained on Mount Széchenyi by the Budapest Unitarian Church. At these and other festive gatherings numerous toasts of welcome were proposed in eloquent terms by our Hungarian friends and were warmly responded to. Our visit to Budapest will be remembered not only for the hospitality and attention shown to us by our own brethren, but for the presence of members of other faiths who were also glad to be of service to us. As we had been met at Vienna by Mr. Jozan, so Professor Boros came from Kolozsvar to Budapest. On Sunday morning we visited the beautiful Houses of Parliament, which are still unfinished, and the Palace of Justice. Both of these buildings are worthy of the aspirations of the Hungarian people and of their charming capital. Subsequently we attended service at the Budapest Unitarian Church. After the service we had a hearty welcome from the church, in addresses from several of its leading members, to which Mr. Anthony replied in an address in excellent taste, and to which Miss Tagart also most feelingly responded. W.

Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, in addition to the cares of his leadership, in his devoted enthusiasm has been good enough to make time to send us also an account of the journey, and we regret that we can only find space for part of the record.

MR. SHRUBSOLE'S RECORD.

Having described the prosperous voyage and the journey as far as Dresden, Mr. Shrubsole tells of the delights of that city, and particularly of the Sunday spent there. In the great Lutheran Church the travellers witnessed a wedding, at which the clergyman delivered an eloquent half-hour's sermon to the bride and bridegroom kneeling before him. Thence our party proceeded to the Roman Catholic cathedral to be present at High Mass, of which Mr. Shrubsole writes as follows :—

Here, again, an eloquent sermon was poured forth in the hearing of a great multitude. This ended, there came a sudden burst of sound from a mighty organ, supplemented by a full band, while the officiating priest and his attendants took up their respective positions. The service proceeded, and by means of a full-voiced choir, which included the principals from the Opera House, accompanied by band and organ, our souls were stirred with deep emotion as the various parts of the Mass were rendered. The writer confesses that he was profoundly moved in an indescribable way by the glorious fugue which formed one of the numbers. It was truly a musical thunderstorm. There was bewildering motion and clashing of the parts, as they successively took up the theme, yet with undertones of ordered beauty suffusing the whole. The effect still lingers in our minds.

As a minor incident, it may be mentioned that one of our ladies was ordered by an official to refrain from using her fan.

Having then recorded the arrival at Vienna on Monday, Aug. 26, and Mr. Jozan's warm welcome of his English friends, Mr. Shrubsole tells of days crowded with interest, of the Art Gallery, of the popular enjoyment of the Prater, and of Lohengrin at the Grand Opera House. Then the story continues :—

Early on Wednesday we were conducted to the outskirts of the city, and ascended by cogwheel railway through vineyards and woods to the top of the Kahlenberg, from whence we obtained a marvellous panoramic view of Vienna and the country around, with the Danube intersecting the natural picture in a graceful double curve. Passing along a ridge we reached the adjacent Leopoldsberg, whose precipitous crags seem to rise up out of the Danube down below. We were much interested in the fortified church on the summit.

Next day, Thursday (Aug. 29), we left Vienna in a hail storm, and a railway carriage, and began our journey across the Lesser Hungarian Plain. (By the way, this has an area of 6,000 square miles.) About half-way to Budapest, we crossed the frontier, and at the first stopping station, a gipsy band on the platform played one of the national marches by way of welcome to Hungary.

By 7 P.M. we steamed into the station at Budapest, and then surprises began. On the platform we were received by a large gathering of people, and ceremonially yet heartily addressed in terms of warmest welcome by Dr. Béla Erödi, President of the Hungarian Geographical Society, and Mr. Szekeley as representatives, respectively, of the Carpathian Society and the local Unitarian congregation. To these addresses I had the pleasure of replying.

From this moment all our previous happy experiences were altogether eclipsed by the surprising kindnesses heaped upon us. Many carriages were in waiting, and without the slightest delay, or thought of luggage, we were swiftly driven to the Hôtel Erzherzog Stephan, which is one of the finest on the Danube front. Directly after breakfast on Friday, our most attentive hosts and guides conducted us to the Akademia and another art collection. On leaving the latter, two new electric cars, selected for our use, appeared almost as if by magic, and we were conveyed through streets of great width, with plenty of trees shading the four footwalks, to the centre of a new bridge from which a broad and easy slope led down to the beautiful wooded island in the Danube, known as St. Margaret's. This lovely place has been greatly favoured by Nature and vastly improved by the Archduke Stephan, to whom it belongs. Trees and plants grow here in sub-tropical luxuriance. There is also a very fine bathing establishment, supplied with water from the hot sulphur spring.

Here we lunched in grand style to the music of a gipsy band, and with the exchange of international courtesies of the most hearty character.

From this fairyland we crossed the Danube by steamer, and climbed the heights of Buda, where we visited a very old church, a High school, and the Royal palace, before descending by means of the funicular railway to the Suspension Bridge, at the other end of which is our hotel, where our extraordinarily genial hosts entertained us for the remainder of the day.

The programme for Saturday was a full one. The ladies and gentlemen who are devoting day after day entirely to us were here by nine, and we went by steamer to the Central Market, a vast magazine of all sorts of edibles. Melons and other choice fruits were here in even greater abundance and variety than at Vienna.

From the Market we went to the Museum, and saw some wonderful pictures, including Munkácsy's celebrated "Incoming of the Magyars."

The details of this and other pictures were eloquently explained in correct English by Miss Jöury, a talented Hungarian lady journalist who has charmed us all by her vivacious and untiring attentions and by her encyclopædic knowledge.

Then we went by the Underground Railway to a restaurant in the City Park, where lunch was served, and a photographic record of the party secured. After a pleasant lounge beneath umbrageous catalpas and other trees of almost tropical character, we were transported across the city and the river to the foot of the Buda Mountains.

By means of a cogwheel railway, we ascended through wooded slopes of great beauty, to an eminence, from whence a panoramic view of the city and its suburbs was obtained.

Tea, à la hongroise, was served in a pavilion, to the strains of a gipsy band, and after tea some of our friends kindly gave us a graceful exposition of the national dances.

Delighted beyond measure, or power of fitting expression, we returned to our temporary home, and closed another day in happy social intercourse with our Hungarian brothers and sisters.

Sunday, Sept. 1, 10 P.M.

After an early breakfast this morning we were taken to the magnificent Houses of Parliament and to the Palace of Justice nearly opposite. The whole of the materials used in these imposing buildings and in their brilliant decorations are entirely of Hungarian origin, with the exception of the figure of Justice which is of pure Carrara marble.

Just before eleven we went to the Unitarian Church, and found the congregation assembled. As soon as we were seated the organ sounded forth the British National Anthem, and every one rose to do it honour.

At the close of the service the Chief President of the congregation uttered words of warm welcome, which were translated by Mr. Jozan. A number of farmers from near Lake Balaton, who represented a congregation lately formed by secession from an orthodox body, joined in the proceedings and came back to lunch with us. It was a great pleasure to associate with these worthy people, who had never seen an English man or woman before. In the afternoon the church was filled with the members of the Francis David Club. Two papers were read, and all the English visitors were elected honorary members. From the church we adjourned to the elegant chambers of the manse, and found great piles of fruit and flowers with other good things on the tea tables. The pleasures of the repast were greatly enhanced by the fact that we were waited upon by a bevy of graceful Hungarian ladies. After tea, back to hotel. Here still another surprise was in store. At our evening meal a silver wreath, bearing a suitable inscription, was presented to Miss Tagart in recognition of the great services rendered to Hungarian Unitarians by that lady and her father. Although reluctant to part, about ten we sang the two National Anthems and a verse or two of a hymn. Then the happy band of pilgrims dispersed to their rooms to pack up in preparation for starting for Transylvania under the care of the Rev. G. Boros at 6 A.M.; and this gave me the opportunity of finishing this epistle, which is simply a brief statement of facts without attempt at embellishment.

THE WELCOME AT BUDAPEST.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding is good enough to send us also the following report of the welcome at Budapest Station:—

Not less than 100 persons had assembled on the platform at Budapest, and as the train steamed into the station a great shout of "éljen" was raised. Its significance increased upon us as the days passed, but that first "long live" sounded strangely unfamiliar. In a moment, as it seemed, the English party was encircled. Bouquets were presented to Miss Tagart by Mrs. Korchmaros and her sister Miss Buzogany. Then Dr. Erödi, a cavalier of the Iron Crown, President of the Hungarian Geographical Society, and a Roman Catholic, spoke as follows:—

In the name of the Transylvanian Society I have the pleasure to express our joy upon your coming into Hungary, to visit, and to make the acquaintance of a land whose people had always a great sympathy for England and the English people. We are sure you will find during your travels the same feelings of sympathy everywhere. We wish you to be happy in our country, and to return satisfied, with favourable impressions, and with large experience of the country. I bid you a hearty welcome.

Mr. Szekeley, son of the Attorney-General, who is one of the presidents of the Budapest congregation, followed. He said:—

Miss Tagart and friends,—I am happy to welcome you here on behalf of the Budapest Unitarian congregation. You are not likely to be taken for strangers in our country, not even those of you who pay their first visit to our country. Hungary may be a long way off from old England, but there are many ties that bind the two nations together—political sympathies, the same struggle for constitutional liberty, and freedom of thought and conscience, and the same conception of brotherhood. You desire to keep in touch with our schools and with our churches, and you assure us of the sympathy with which you regard our movements. I hope it will add to the grace of our sympathies if you come into contact with our people and if you will see as much as you can of our country, and chiefly of our young and beautiful capital. You are welcome, you are welcome to the Hungarian congregation.

Cheers were raised on both sides as Mr. Szekeley concluded; general attention was attracted, and it was to a large crowd that Mr. Shrubsole, as leader, replied:—

Permit me to say that the words of welcome which you have so kindly addressed to us have indeed touched our hearts. They carry with them the conviction of perfect sincerity, and we accept them with much gratitude. We have come here partly that we may visit places of deep interest to us because of religious associations, and also because we greatly desire to know more of a people whom we so much respect in consequence of what we have heard of them. We come here that we may see them ourselves, and hold intercourse with them. We have had a somewhat long journey, and you will probably excuse me from saying more at this moment. But we are greatly pleased with the kind reception that you have been good enough to give to us.

Every man takes care that his neighbour shall not cheat him. But a day comes when he begins to care that he do not cheat his neighbour. Then all goes well. He has changed his market cart into a chariot of the sun.—Emerson.

We are here and now in a spiritual world, ruled by spiritual forces; and just in proportion as one lives in the spirit—lives unselfishly, with ardour and purpose, and enthusiasm—does he live in the invisible world and find his daily consciousness of heaven.—Lilian Whiting.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

THE study of mediævalism is of recent origin. Two centuries ago "Augustan" writers, who spoke of the Elizabethan era as "barbarous," dismissed the "unpolished strain" of Chaucer to the Dark Ages. To wigged and powdered Society "Gothic" was never quite distinguishable from "Savage." Even Gibbon, whose "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" brought him into contact with mediæval chivalry and piety, expressed but a grudging admiration of the one and contempt for the other. Not only were the schools of Oxford and Cambridge "founded," he said, "in a dark age of false and barbarous Science," but the home of Dante, Giotto, and Fra Angelico seems to have interested him chiefly for its Venus de Medici. In a contemplated work on the "Lives" of eminent Englishmen, his survey only went back to the reign of Henry VIII. Of the monastic life he concluded that its "voluntary martyrdom must have gradually destroyed the sensibility both of body and mind," and declared that a "cruel, unfeeling temper has characterised the monks of every age and country."

Revived interest in the Middle Ages.

The discovery of the greatness of the Middle Ages, and the change of feeling with regard to them, may be said to have begun in this country with Sir Walter Scott. In the dull days before and after the Battle of Waterloo he fed the exhausted imagination of the English public with his "Waverley Novels," with stories of Robin Hood and Cœur de Lion, crusades and tournaments, Highland chieftains, castles, abbots, and monasteries—and, in the words of Newman, "stimulated the mental thirst and fed the hopes of the people, setting before them visions which when once seen are not easily forgotten, and silently indoctrinating them with noble ideas which might afterwards be appealed to as first principles"; thus, as he saw, preparing the way for the Tractarian movement. Newman's position in religion and politics was that of a neo-mediævalist. He hated both Evangelical Protestantism and German Liberalism as forms of modern "Philistinism," alike hostile through ignorance and prejudice to the faith of the Middle Ages. He welcomed Keble's Christian Year, and planned a series of the "Lives of English Saints," which he hoped would "make Englishmen love their country better, and on truer grounds . . . teach them to invest her cities and villages, her hills and springs, with sacred associations, give them insight into her present historical position, instruct them in the capabilities of the English character, and open upon them new hopes and duties."

Ruskin's Championship.

In the year in which Newman wrote thus, 1843, appeared Carlyle's "Past and Present" and the first volume of Ruskin's "Modern Painters." Carlyle contrasts the well-disciplined and God-fearing régime of Abbot Samson at St. Edmundsbury, as found by him in Jocelin of Brakelond's "Chronicle," with the disorganised selfishness of our industrial individualism in the time of the Chartist riots, and emphasises, as the essential distinction, that in the twelfth century religion was not, as in the nineteenth, "a horrible, restless doubt, still less a far horribler composed cant, but a great heaven-high Unquestionability, encompassing, interpenetrating the whole of life." But Ruskin first, and alone, has realised the genius of mediævalism. He first struck at the Renaissance as a Reminiscence. He denounced it as "a return to Pagan systems, not to adopt them and hallow them for Christianity, but to rank it under them as an imitator and pupil," and sought to prove that its great masters, Raphael and Michel-Angelo, instead of initiating a new era, were survivors of a noble religious past, their greatness consisting in their connection with the Gothic age, their weakness partly in approximation to ancient heathen ideals, partly in their surrender to modern pride of knowledge. Much of his work has been devoted to the brilliant, and I think it will be acknowledged, convincing demonstration that Florence and Venice, as supreme examples of European citizenship, rose and fell with the faith of St. Francis.

I might say very much more, but must be content to remind you that in the poetry of Browning and Tennyson, the painting of the "Pre-Raphaelites" and Burne-Jones, the arts and crafts of William Morris, the revival of the study of Dante, of mediæval poetry and Gothic architecture, and the printing and translation of large portions of our valuable store of mediæval chronicle-writing, we may trace the same enthusiasm for the Old Catholic culture, and its attraction for all sections of the community.

Study of the Mediæval Chronicles.

Interest in the early history of England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries brought the chronicles into notice earlier than other forms of mediæval literature. They were searched, for instance, by Leland and Bale for evidence of the corruption of the monasteries, by Parker in defence of the Anglican position, by Milton in his attacks on episcopacy, by Selden for the Parliament, and by Twysden for the Crown. Scholars abounded during the ecclesiastical and constitutional struggles. But in the eighteenth century they were less numerous. The subject languished as it became more purely academic. In the last century, however, it revived again, and English history has been re-written as the mediæval chronicles have been made to yield up their treasures to private and Government explorers. In 1822 the House of Commons petitioned for "a complete edition of the ancient historians of this realm, and assured His Majesty that whatever expense might be necessary for this purpose would be made good." In 1857 began the series of invaluable publications by the Master of the Rolls, which has been carried on by a body of men too numerous to mention; though I must refer in this place, and at this time, to the magnificent services rendered by the late Bishop of Oxford. The volumes edited by Dr. Stubbs, with masterly prefaces from his hand, are, I need hardly say, a permanent contribution to our historical literature and a luminous exposition of the political life of England during the century and a-half following the Norman Conquest.

To be given to the People.

It is not enough, however, that these ancient records should be edited and summarised for the use of scholars. We want them translated into English for the people. They must be delivered from their monkish Latin, and made accessible, in the speech, say of Wiclif or Malory, with something, that is, of their mediæval flavour about them, to all who will take a little pains to read. Bohn's excellent series needs to be extended, only in an English that is both simple and genuinely antique. The spirit of an old chronicle cannot be conveyed in the language of an article in the Times or Fortnightly Review.

Annals, Chronicle and History.

Now, the term "chronicle," as I will use it, is a loose and comprehensive one. I will not attempt to draw a clear distinction between annals, a chronicle, and a history. Annals may be defined as mere jottings down of unconnected events, a chronicle as a record of events in order of time, and a history as an arrangement of events in their relations of cause and effect; but it is often extremely difficult, if not impossible, to say where one begins and another ends. Mediæval records, I may perhaps venture to remark, are rarely mere annals and never pure histories, and sometimes are almost pure fictions. The middle word, therefore, may conveniently include all prose narratives of events, actual or imaginary, whether connected or not in logical sequence; and I will speak under this head of such different writings as the meagre Gesta Veterum Northanhymbrorum, the copious Chronica Majora of Matthew Paris, the mythical Historia Britonum of Geoffrey of Monmouth, the semi-ironical De Rebus Gestis Ricardi of Richard of Devizes, and the amusing gossipy De Nugis Curialium of Walter Map.

Our Wealth of Chronicles.

We are rich in this class of literature, probably richer than any country in Europe. We have nothing, indeed, so vivacious, so entertaining as Froissart's Chronique, nothing so perfect in their way as Brother Leo's Speculum Perfectionis and Joinville's Vie de Saint Louis; but our chroniclers are serious and truthful. We possess Asser's Vita Aelfredi, the Itinerarium of Cœur de Lion ascribed to Richard the Canon, and the Magna Vita of St. Hugh of Lincoln by Adam of Eynsham; and, above all, among Germanic peoples we alone have such early and valuable writings as Baeda's Historia Ecclesiastica and the old English Chronicles. From the beginning, monastic life in England was evangelistic and educational, and not reclusive as generally on the Continent. In this country, the church, literature, music, law, medicine, and, to a considerable extent, statesmanship, grew out of the monastery. Each religious house of any importance had its school, library, scriptorium, and sanatorium. The monks and nuns were readers, writers, and physicians, principally for the sake of their work among the heathen.

Character of the Chronicler.

The annalist, when he appeared, was no ascetic. He was in touch with human life, and recorded what he thought was of moment in the history of the church and the nation. And he was impersonal, one of a succession of recorders, and anonymous; whence so many of our chronicles bear the name of the monastery, not of any particular author. Some of them which have a writer's name are portions of a larger work. He also borrowed from his neighbours. Copies of the chronicle were made in the scriptorium and sent in exchange to other monasteries: which explains why our historical material has suffered so much less from the ravages of war and fire than our poetic, and while only a fragment of our mediæval verse remains, it is questionable whether we have lost any work of primary historical value. Later the chronicler was a cleric, and a man of the world. He might be a chaplain to a bishop or a baron or to the King, a justice or an ambassador. He came thus into touch with the Court, with official records, with foreigners, with Continental politics and fashions. But the traditional conscientiousness of his calling, as a chronicler, remaining with him, he was usually a much more reliable authority than the Frenchman. At any rate, the Englishman was—if not the Welshman, whose contributions to our chronicle-writing, as to our poetry, have had other qualities than veracity.

* The first of two lectures delivered in Manchester College, Oxford, Aug. 5 and 6, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students.

Gildas and Baeda.

A Welshman and an Englishman stand at the head of our monastic literature and make an instructive contrast. Gildas and Baeda represent, almost pure, the Celtic and Teutonic elements which have blended, and still blend, in the formation of our national character. In himself, of course, Gildas is not worthy of being named with Baeda; but as an early type of the cultivated Briton, of the conquered race which has so signally influenced and in certain ways subdued the conquerors, he is of very great interest indeed. His De Calamitate, Excidio et Conquestu Britanniae, consisting of a brief sketch of the history of Britain from the arrival of the Romans, with a preface and an epistle of warning to British princes, is a querulous lamentation over the disasters which have befallen his people by the invasion of the English. About one-third of the book has value for the historian, as the record, by an eye-witness, who was a Christian and a scholar, of events, in or near the year 565 A.D., which the English were too barbarous to relate. Gildas was a Romanised Briton who stood by his country when most of his class fled to Brittany. He writes with Celtic fervour and floweriness. Here is his description, loaded with similes, of the onslaught of the Roman legions on the Picts and Scots:—

After these things, when it was said unto them what cruel deeds were wrought upon the Britons, then had the Romans pity on them, as deep as may be in the heart of a man, and straightway, like eagles in their flight, they made haste with unlooked-for hosts of men by land and sea; and smiting the necks of their foes with the edge of the sword, they mowed them down, like leaves when they fall to the earth; and as when a mountain-torrent, swollen with a flood of waters, and bursting its banks with a roaring tumult, its waves rising with yeasty foam even to the stars, and blinding the eyes with its swift eddies, hurls before it, with one rolling billow, every hindrance in its path, so our brave champions cast away the enemy beyond the sea.

In all Baeda's writings you will find no passage like this. He does not indulge in this sort of rhetoric. For one thing, he is never sufficiently excited; and if he were, he would not have sufficient fancy. He is too matter-of-fact, too phlegmatic. Once he is stirred to speak of "the rivers of knowledge" which flowed from Theodore and Hadrian at Canterbury, and "watered the hearts of their hearers," but this is his highest flight. More characteristic is his homely comparison of Caedmon's poetical ruminations to an ox chewing the cud. His style is tame compared with that of Gildas. He is incapable of anything so fierce and vivid as the account by the latter of the westward advance of the English and the sack of a British town—an account which is the best possible commentary on the desolate and charred remains of villas, walls, and temples unearthed by our antiquarians from time to time on the old Roman roads:—

The fire of wrath, kindled righteously by the sins of former time, spread abroad, even from sea to sea, fed by our foemen in the east; nor was it quenched until, devouring cities and fields round about, it came to the other side of the island, and dipped its red and savage tongue in the western main. . . . Then were pillars thrown down by the blows of the ram, and the land-folk turned to flight, with bishops, priests, and men of the city in a heap, while swords gleamed and flames crackled on every hand. Sorrowful to behold, in the midst of the streets lay the tops of lofty towers, fallen to the ground, stones of high walls, holy altars, and fragments of human flesh, clotted with gore, as if they had been crushed in a mill, without hope of burial, save among the ruins of dwellings, or in the ravenous maws of wild birds and beasts.

In the same way the Englishman is chary, not to say timid, of generalisations. While Gildas flings right and left his strong adjectives and sweeping statements, Baeda is cautious to a degree. He confines himself almost absolutely to particulars. A general proposition is even rarer with him than a figure of speech. I have only noticed three, and they are significant. One is the truly English declaration that "Discretion is the mother of the virtues." The second, which unhappily is not so English as it used to be, is the claim for music that it is "of all accomplishments the most commendable, courtly, pleasing, glad and beautiful—encouraging a man to bear fatigue, strengthening him in labour, refreshing his troubled mind, driving away his headaches, and dispelling depraved humours and gloomy spirits." The third is the remark, in his quiet nook of earth, that it is "customary for tired cattle to turn gently from side to side."

Baeda's Homeliness and the Charm of his Story.

Baeda, who was born in the year 673—more than a hundred years after Gildas wrote his De Calamitate Britanniae—and died in 735, was one of those peaceable, stay-at-home people who get to know and love every inch of their own hillside, and are content to believe that there is no place like it in the world. Except for a visit or two to York and Canterbury, he seems to have spent his whole life in the neighbourhood of Jarrow. The information for his Historia Ecclesiastica was obtained from books, from travellers (the monasteries, let us remember, were the mediæval inns), and from correspondents in all parts of England. Nearly one half of this fine work deals with Northumbrian affairs. It is, as all his writings are, a compilation, a text-book for monastic students, the result of plodding industry and practical purpose rather than literary art, crowded with good facts and not a little superstition, but rather shapeless in its putting-together; and once or twice a trifle wearisome, as when the Easter controversy, then a burning subject, crops up. Throughout, in every chapter, we feel Baeda's gentle charity. What he saw within his limited horizon he saw clearly and kindly. His biographical sketches, slight as they are, make us proud of our old English ancestry. Even the old heathen King of Mercia, the terrible Penda, is drawn in a way that makes us sorry not to see more of him. Who can forget Gregory and the English boys in the Roman market-place; Augustine and the British monks, who judged him no true missionary of Christ because he kept his seat; the good bishop Laurentius, who won again King Eadbald by his bleeding back; the dying child at Barking calling for the nun Edith; the youth, Imma, who, left as dead on the battle-field, recovered, and, wandering in the disguise of a peasant, found his way home; the heathen thane of King Eadwine, who tells the parable of the sparrow darting through the mead-hall; Aidan and his "twelve boys"; Cuthbert; John of Beverley; and, above all, the abbess, Hild, and her poet-scholar, Caedmon? No one who cares for English history, or the English nation, should fail to read, and read again, Baeda's Historia Ecclesiastica, if only in a translation.

FREE-WILL AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Sir,—On reading the two letters on this subject in your last issue, I asked myself whether there are not indications at present that, while in the other branches of the Christian Church the doctrine of Free-will is more widely nnd deeply believed in than ever before, Unitarianism, now that its great Libertarian philosopher and prophet has passed into the higher life, is about to return once more to its earliest love, and to embrace again that determinist view of human nature from which the genius of Price, of Martineau, and of Channing has now for three-quarters of a century succeeded in snatching it away. I am not seriously apprehensive of this result; but, nevertheless, I do believe that the time has come when we should take earnest counsel with each other on this question; and it is because I so think that I venture to tax your patience and that of your readers by another long communication.

I am glad that my criticism of Dr. Mellone's paper in Mind has elicited from my gifted friend a fuller utterance; but I must confess that even now, after reading Dr. Mellone's last letter above a dozen times, I still find myself as little able to clearly understand what is his real position in regard to the Free-will question, as I am to understand why he spoke of the Libertarians as "the elect." What is particularly perplexing to me is that while in the first three of the four sections into which he divides his letter he appears to be vigorously assailing the Libertarian view of the Will and its functions, in the fourth section he makes a reference to Kant which, if it has any intelligible meaning at all, can only mean that Dr. Mellone is as thorough-going a Libertarian as are Lotze, Dr. Martineau, and Professor William James. This inconsistency will, I think, be evident, if I discuss the sections of his letter seriatim.

In the first section he repeats his assertion that "the Absolute Idealist means by Moral Responsibility just what Common Sense means"; and he endeavours to justify this statement by saying that "the mass of mankind, while believing most firmly in Moral Responsibility, have no theory of volition whatever." Now, whether the great mass of mankind have any "theory" about volition or not, they certainly have what is infinitely more real and influential than any theory—namely, a firm belief (which the Absolute Idealists profess not to have) that the wrong-doer whom they blame and hold morally responsible possessed at some time or times the power of forming moral decisions different from those which he actually did form. And not only have the great mass of mankind this belief, but what is more, this belief forms a vital and essential element in their very conception of moral responsibility; and if they lost this underlying conviction of the Self's power to choose between alternative possibilities, they would tell Dr. Mellone that a man cannot reasonably be blamed for that which it was not in his power to leave undone, and they would cease to feel Moral Responsibility in the ordinary and proper meaning of those words. The man who holds that our so-called sins need not have been committed, and the man who holds that their commission was inevitable, cannot have the same sentiment of Moral Responsibility. When, then, Dr. Mellone draws a distinction between the fact of Moral Responsibility and the theory or belief about human volition, and speaks of them as independent and apart from one another, he is really dealing with fictitious abstractions which neither have, nor can have, any separate existence, and which owe their assumed independence of each other simply to the exigencies of that school of Absolute Idealists (or "soft determinists," as Professor James most happily and appropriately terms them) who are naturally anxious to retain all the words most descriptive of man's moral and religious life, and are yet unwilling to allow the reality of man's possession of that power of free preferential choice between competing motives out of which power alone these words take their origin, and in which alone they find their true meaning and justification. I repeat, therefore, with confidence the statement I made in my last letter, that those writers who say that Absolute Idealists on the one hand, and Libertarians and common-sense people on the other, have just the same sense of Moral Responsibility, are, in so saying, making an equivocal and misleading use of the words "Moral Responsibility."

The second section of Dr. Mellone's letter is intended, apparently, as a refutation of the Libertarian theory of volition; but in what way it refutes this theory I am wholly unable to see. The Libertarian says that when in seasons of temptation there arise out of a man's character two conflicting promptings to action, one of which is felt to be divine and ideal while the other is felt to be comparatively selfish and sensual, the man's self can determine itself in favour of one or the other of these competing influences, and is conscious in so doing that it was equally possible for it to have taken the other side. Now what has Dr. Mellone to say against this?

Simply this, that the Libertarian has really no right to say it was "possible." And why has he no right? Why, because Dr. Mellone and his co-thinkers have decided that the word "possible" can only be used to denote "the absence of external necessity or constraint." The Libertarians naturally object to this arbitrary limitation of the meaning of the words "possible" and "impossible," and would like to know why the word "possible" may not be used to indicate "the absence of internal necessity." The question is, Has the Eternal so constituted the human self and its character that in the moral crises of that self's life it is open to it to determine itself in either of two equally possible ways? If it is not so constituted, it follows by internal necessity that our characters could never have developed in any other way than that in which they have developed. Dr. Mellone apparently agrees with the Absolute Idealists that we are so constituted that it is never open to the self to determine itself in any other way than that in which it actually does determine itself. Why, then, does he not plainly say so, as my other critic, Mr. Mott, has no hesitation in doing? I can only conjecture that Dr. Mellone plainly sees what, it seems, Mr. Mott does not plainly see, that if you once distinctly admit that no real option is allowed to man, you as good as say that Repentance and Remorse are wholly irrational and unjustifiable emotions; and that is an admission from which Dr. Mellone's moral and religious nature instinctively recoils.

I may skip Dr. Mellone's third section, for the pith of it is implied in his fourth and last section; though I may, in passing, say that my own experience supports the doctrine that in determining ourselves on either the right or the wrong side in any moral crisis we are immediately conscious that it is in our power to decide otherwise.

In his last section it appears clear to me Dr. Mellone either displays less than his usual philosophical acuteness, or else, what is very unlikely, is willing, after all, to cast in his lot with the Libertarians, whose theory he, in his second section, has endeavoured to overthrow. Kant, like most of our greatest thinkers, is, I believe, not wholly consistent in his psychological and ethical writings, but there can be no doubt that he was at heart nearly as thorough a Libertarian as Dr. Martineau was. He distinctly says that man is morally responsible because, and only because, he could have chosen for himself a different character than that which he actually has. And the particular passage which Dr. Mellone quotes is only intelligible on the hypothesis that the human Self in its moral history could have taken a course quite other than that which it actually took. For, as Dr. Mellone tells us, the "ought" implies the "can." In a moral crisis, then, it is, according to Kant, always possible for a man to do what he is conscious he ought to do. But, as a matter of fact, we are all aware that at times we have not done our duty, have not done what we felt we ought to have done. As at such time we have actually taken the wrong side, it is obvious we were able to take it; but Kant tells us that we were at the same time able to take the right side; and this power of free choice between equally possible alternatives is just what the Libertarian claims for man, and it is also just what the Absolute Idealist declares to have no real existence. I remember that I once had the privilege of a talk with Professor Otto Pfleiderer on this subject, in which I defended the Libertarian and he the Absolute Idealist position.

It occurred to me that I might refute the Professor by appealing to Kant. So I said to him, "Was Kant right when he said that the sollen implies the können?" thinking that he, like Dr. Mellone, would express his agreement with Kant, in which case I should have convicted him of inconsistency. But I wholly miscalculated, for he instantly replied: "Kant was certainly wrong; he should not have said that the 'ought' implies that the individual man who feels it can do it, but only that it implies that the human race in the long run will be able to do it." If, then, Dr. Mellone really accepts Kant's saying as true, the Libertarians may have the pleasure of claiming him as a valuable ally. And in like manner with regard to the beautiful and true quotation with which he closes his letter, the writer of it evidently means the soul to say that she is able to meet the claims of Duty, and that she is also able, if she should so choose, to neglect them. Does Dr. Mellone also mean this? If so, he is a Libertarian, and then why he has written sections one and two becomes a mystery.

I am sorry that my letter has run to such an unconscionable length that I cannot reply in full to Mr. Mott's letter. I should like, however, to ask him to consider whether Coleridge is not right when he declares in his "Aids to Reflection" that there is an impassable gulf between the sentiment of Regret and that of Remorse, that while both Determinists and Libertarians may rationally feel the former, it is only Libertarians who can consistently cherish the latter. I would also ask him whether he is prepared to admit that moral indignation directed against a mean person or a hypocrite is, from the Determinist's point of view, a wholly unjustifiable emotion, and whether he holds, as a consistent Determinist must, that the greatest sinners and criminals should awaken simply sentiments of pity and compassion, and that the greater the sin and the greater the criminality the greater should be the pity, seeing that these unfortunate persons have, through influences over which they have no control, been brought into this wretched condition. Does Mr. Mott think that this transformation of our moral sentiments, even when aided by Regret, would most effectually conduce either to individual reformation or to social progress?

CHARLES B. UPTON.

PEACE MANIFESTOES.

Sir,—It seems to me a pity that any one should formulate and sign manifestoes like "the short and simple" one you publish in The Inquirer of Aug. 31, for these manifestations cannot do the least atom of good, such as intended by their adherents, while they may do harm and cannot but weaken the influence of the ministers who ask that terms of peace be offered to the Boers "which they may accept without loss of self-respect!" at a moment when every newspaper reader knows that they will not accept anything short of "full independence." The juxtaposition of one Roman Catholic and twenty-four Church clergymen makes one wonder what these twenty-five think of the joint claim of the eight Unitarians to also "interpret the Christian Faith."

It seems to me, also, that it is a perversion of facts to imply (1) that British desire for territory, or (3) conquest, are the cause of the war. The reproach might more justly be directed against the Boers who unnecessarily commenced the war, and who might well have cherished dreams of conquest, seeing that two years ago no one would have believed that England could place 250,000 men in South Africa, which number events have shown to be barely sufficient. Two years ago also, not one man in a hundred in this country desired war or lusted after the Transvaal territory; while now, not one in a hundred would approve the manifesto. Surely any impartial observer, who can disentangle facts from phrases, should hesitate to condemn or belittle his own countrymen, while these, doing their duty, give their life's blood, as so many of all classes have done and are doing, in combat against a not always estimable enemy, who wantonly invaded, annexed and for four months held, portions of British territory.

Richard Simon.

Nottingham, Sept. 2.

WISBORO' MISSION CHURCH.

Sir,—Would you allow me to appeal to your readers on behalf of this off-spring of Billingshurst. Through the thoughtful kindness of the Provincial Assembly in providing me with a bicycle, I have been enabled for a year past to conduct Sunday afternoon services at Wisboro', and through the winter a Thursday evening service also.

There is a general desire among the people of the district for a reading and recreation room, to be opened four nights a week during the coming winter. A strong local committee has been appointed to carry out the necessary arrangements. The people themselves are providing a small slow-combustion stove, and by means of subscriptions they hope to pay for heating and lighting and working expenses.

Mr. William Carter, of the Billingshurst congregation, has kindly offered us the use of his powerful lantern, and when we can afford it we shall hire sets of slides from London.

Might I ask your readers to provide us with draughts and chess and kindred winter games. A bagatelle board would be especially welcome. We would feel grateful if your readers would send us their periodicals and magazines when they have done with them.

In a remote district like Wisboro', where nothing is stirring, it would be a real kindness to brighten the lives and give tone to the intellect of the people of the district.

Papers and magazines for this purpose would be thankfully received by the Rev. Geo. Lansdown, Billingshurst, Sussex.

Geo. Lansdown.

The twenty-third annual report of the Social and Political Education League, which has just been issued, states that the unprecedented series of London elections, extending over the entire lecture season, together with the death of H.M. Queen Victoria, led to a reduction in the number of lectures delivered during the winter of 1900-1901 as compared with the previous year, the numbers being 163 and 210 respectively; but audiences were larger and the reports very gratifying. Reference is made to the death of the late Bishop of London, an ex-President and Vice-President of the League, and of two distinguished members of the lecturing staff, Mr. Douglas Marriott (who died in South Africa), and Mr. Walter Slater. The new President is Sir Alfred Lyall, K.C.B., D.C.L., LL.D. The past Presidents include Sir J. R. Seeley, Mr. J. A. Froude, Professor Huxley, Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. Bryce, M.P., Professor Dicey, Mr. Leslie Stephen, Sir Edward Fry, Dr. Gardiner, Mr. Lecky, M.P., Dr. Hodgkin, Sir E. M. Grant Duff, and Mr. Leonard Courtney. All the lectures are given gratuitously. Copies of the lecture list may be obtained from the organising secretary, Mr. A. H. Reed, 23, Old-square, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—The church at Highland-place still depends on supplies. Mr. J. P. Kane, late of Carmarthen College, did duty on Sunday last.

Cardigan (Pulpit Exchanges).—We note in Yr Ymofynydd that our Cardiganshire ministers have just completed their round of annual exchanges. These exchanges are very popular with the congregations, and bring together large attendances. The ministers engaged were the Revs. John Davies, R. C. Jones, D. Evans, T. Arthur Thomas, Lewis Williams, and Evan O. Jenkins.

Devonport.—Mr. Robinson Hughes having terminated his relations with the Christ Church congregation, the services for the present are in charge of the Rev. E. B. Russell, M.A., of Torquay.

Ditchling.—The Harvest Service was held here on Sunday morning last, the collection being devoted to the funds of the Sussex County Hospital. The service was conducted by Mr. Elliott, from Highgate, and the quaint old chapel was beautifully decorated by the little band of faithful people who labour steadfastly to keep open this outpost of Liberal Christianity in a district where the adherents are few and widely scattered. Many who can seldom attend, are deeply interested in the cause, and rejoice to see it maintained year by year in quiet sincerity of purpose.

Dowlais.—We hear that the Rev. David Rees, of the Rhondda, has received a unanimous invitation to the pulpit at Dowlais.

Lampeter.—Operations to save the church building from collapse have now been commenced. We hear that £500 have been collected locally towards the £1,500 needed to complete the building. The Lampeter congregation is one of the most vigorous in Wales, to be sustained by all the sympathy and help that can be given.

Leeds: Mill-hill.—The Chapel Record for August and September announces that the Committee of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union have decided to issue a quarterly record of the doings of the churches in the Union, and the Revs. John Ellis and Charles Harvey Cook have been appointed editors. The Chapel Record adds: "If this little undertaking is duly recognised, the individual congregations supplying information of general interest, and all showing their interest in each others welfare by reading and supporting the Record, we have no doubt the influence of it will be most salutary. It will help us to feel that we are a church, united by the profession of great truths, and working together to make them known." At the eighteenth meeting of the Guild of Service on July 3, it was arranged to appeal to the congregation for gifts of clothing for the women and children in the Concentration Camps in South Africa, and a meeting of ladies was arranged for to repair and sort such as came in. A large bale was got together and sent to the Committee of the Victoria League, which has the approval of the Secretary of State for War. This Committee is not connected with either political party. Mr. Haldane, K.C., M.P., Mr. Asquith, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and Sir Bartle Frere being among the members. So that neither the Guild, nor the congregation through it, are in anywise committed unless it be to the recognition, with the War Office, that "There is in the Concentration Camps considerable scope for the exercise of properly regulated private charity."

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—The first wedding in the new church in Narborough-road, took place, as announced in our present issue on Thursday, Aug. 29, the Rev. W. Whitaker, minister of the church, officiating.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—The new meeting-room, which has been built in the upper part of the grounds of the Ancient Chapel, for congregational and school purposes, is to be opened with a social meeting on Tuesday evening, 24th inst. On the previous Sunday evening a service of dedication will be held in the meeting-room, in which the Rev. V. D. Davis will take part with the Rev. W. J. Jupp, the minister of the chapel.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—The Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein will resume his ministry after the summer holiday, on Sunday, 15th inst. Dr. Klein announces as the subjects of his Sunday evening sermons for Sept. 15, 22, and 29, "Religion and the Invisible," "The Story of Adam's Fall," and "St. Luke's 'Song of Mary' as a Unitarian Hymn."

Plymouth.—The Rev. R. C. Dendy began his ministry here on Sunday last.

Preston.—A tablet has recently been placed in Percy-street Chapel, bearing the following inscription:—"To the glory of God and in loving memory of Charlotte Lavinia Winstanley, relict of William Winstanley, Esq., J.P., of Chaigeley Manor and West Cliff, Preston, and eldest daughter of Alfred Lowe, Esq., J.P., of Highfield House, Nottingham. Born 14th February, 1816. Died 14th March, 1899. To the memory of one of the best and gentlest of mothers, this tablet is erected by her devoted children."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DURING the week the news from America has been watched from day to day with intense anxiety, since we heard that on Friday week President McKinley was shot by an Anarchist while receiving the people in the Temple of Music at the American Exposition at Buffalo. Horror at the insane and detestable crime, and deepest sympathy with the President and his wife and with the American people, have been felt throughout the world, except in extreme Anarchist circles; and the more hopeful accounts, after the first shock, have brought the utmost relief, with the hope that the President's life may not be sacrificed. After every such crime, as after the assassination of President Carnot and King Humbert, the general cry is for fierce repression. The wiser impulse is for patience and for more determined grappling with the social conditions which produce this hideous and pitiful disease.

THE annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science opened on Wednesday evening at Glasgow, when the President, Professor A. W. Rücker, delivered his address in St. Andrew's Hall, opening with an eloquent tribute to our late Queen and loyal assurances to the King, and then in the main body of the address dealing elaborately with the Atomic Theory, and the significance of research into the ultimate elements and properties of matter. While admitting that physical science had not succeeded in tearing the veil of mystery from the world around us, the President claimed that progress in real knowledge of that which is beneath appearances had been made, and that until an equally intelligible rival theory could be produced they might reasonably conclude "that atoms are not merely helps to puzzle mathematicians, but physical realities." The religious world will receive the President's exposition with the respect due to the teachings of a master in his own sphere, but without any such excitement as followed Tyndall's famous Belfast address, having long since learnt that investigations in this direction cannot affect one way or the other the ultimate questions of spiritual reality.

AT this year's meeting of the British Association there is for the first time a section on Education, with Sir John Gorst as President. Professor Rücker, in noting the fact in his presidential address, welcomed the addition to the scope of the Association's labours and said :—

Education is passing through a transitional stage. The recent debates in Parliament; the great gifts of Mr. Carnegie; the discussion as to University organisation in the North of England; the reconstitution of the University of London; the increasing importance attached to the application of knowledge both to the investigation of Nature and to the purposes of industry, are all evidence of the growing conviction that without advance in education we cannot retain our position among the nations of the world. If the British Association can provide a platform on which these matters may be discussed in a scientific but practical spirit, free from the misrepresentations of the hustings and the exaggerations of the partisan, it will contribute in no slight measure to the national welfare.

IN connection with the national commemoration of Alfred the Great, a special exhibit has been arranged at the British Museum, in two cases near the head of the chief staircase. In one case are shown manuscripts of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Asser's Life of Alfred, and the King's own book of Laws and his "Orosius" and "Boethius"; also various ancient charters of the period. In the other case are a large number of coins and a number of very curious rings, &c., including a gold ring of Ethelwulf, King of Wessex, and Alfred's father. This ring was found in 1780 near the village of Laverstock, in Wiltshire, in the neighbourhood of Salisbury. It was pressed out of a cart-rut in a field. There is also a model of the famous Alfred jewel, now preserved in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, which was found in the Isle of Athelney in 1693.

DR. JOHN HUNTER is to close his ministry at the Trinity Congregational Church in Glasgow to-morrow, and with the first Sunday in October enters on his new charge in London, at the King's Weigh House Chapel. He has been for the past fourteen years in Glasgow, and his ministry has been of great power among thoughtful people, fearless in its liberalism, with a firm hold upon the central truths of spiritual religion. Dr. Hunter, who was born at Aberdeen in 1849, was educated for the ministry at the Nottingham Congregational College, and at Spring Hill College, Birmingham. His first charge was at York, where he remained for eleven years; and then, after about five years at the Wycliffe Church, Hull, he settled, in 1887, at Glasgow. In 1893 the University of that city conferred on him a Doctorate of Divinity. His coming to London will be a great accession to the forces of liberal Christian faith.

THE National Conference Guilds' Union has published a first Leaflet on "The Guild Idea," which we have reprinted in another column, and which, we trust, will receive the earnest consideration of all who are interested in the welfare of our churches. At the National Conference at Leicester last year it will be remembered that the Rev. John Ellis, of Sheffield, read a paper on "How best to organise the Religious Life of our Young People," strongly advocating the formation of Guilds in connection with our churches; and a further lecture by Mr. Ellis on the same subject was published in the three successive numbers of THE INQUIRER, of March 16, 23, and 30. The Guilds' Union was formed at a meeting, held in Little Portland-street Chapel, on Thursday afternoon in Whit-week, and we now have the first fruits of their labours in the "Manual of Services and Prayers (which we noticed in our issue of Aug. 24), and in this Leaflet. The objects of the Guilds' Union command our heartiest assent. The present movement appears to us to hold the promise of much good to our community, and there is only one word of caution we are inclined to add. The Leaflet says: "The meetings for worship, whether weekly or monthly, should be the pulse of the whole machine"; and certainly the whole activity of the Guild must find its inspiration in the inward life of devotion. But the most wholesome development of the Guild will, in our view, find the constant sustenance for its deeper life not in separate meetings for worship of the Guild members alone, but in the united weekly worship of the whole church. The Guild meetings for worship may be the pulse, in the sense of being the index of the strength of the life poured out from the central heart; but it is not a healthy condition of things, nor one that we can be content to accept as normal, when that heart fails of its true inspiring power, and it becomes necessary to form a church within the church.

"MAN'S NOTHING-PERFECT—GOD'S ALL-COMPLETE."

BY THE REV. CHARLES G. AMES.*

Two hundred years ago George Fox, a plain man of great sincerity and of hungry heart, went travelling about England, seeking for spiritual guidance. Intent on reality, he was too clear-sighted to be deceived by labels; and he soon learned to distinguish between the popular noises and the voices of the Spirit. He was reluctantly driven to conclude that the lawyers of the day did not understand justice, that the physicians did not understand the art of healing, and that the clergy did not understand religion. There was no lack of form and profession, but he missed the life. The most musical church services reached his ear like sounding brass, and the sacred words rattled like dried seed-vessels from which the fruit is gone. Theo. Brown, late of Worcester, tells us that in the windy autumn woods he listened for a while to the rustling of the dead leaves. He found "they had nothing to say, and kept saying it." So he betook himself elsewhere. So George Fox turned sadly away from the preachers, saying that "none of them spoke to his condition." After weary, footsore, and heartsore wandering, he found peace in believing that the humblest earthen vessel might contain the heavenly treasure, that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were found in the trusting heart.

When we do the works of God, then we shall know that God is with us. The inward light will shine from us, the inward power will work through us. In that illumination we shall see the Son of man and the Son of God in the least of our brethren; by that power we shall work the greater miracles of spiritual healing and raising the dead.

When Dr. Wayland was asked, "Are the Unitarians Christians?" he answered the question with another. "Can they stand the test? Can they cast out devils?" Wherever there is power to overcome evil with good, there the kingdom has come and the will is done. Our patriarch, Dr. Furness, greatly insisted on "the increase of respect among men" as the supreme evidence of the spread of Christianity. Per contra, the decline of respect, as shown in social and international antagonisms, in the growth of caste and the willingness of men to grow rich by making others poor, is the manifestation of Antichrist. These things we must boldly affirm, to the end "that they who have believed in God may be careful to maintain good works." We shall know the true civilisation when we see it. Power will be put to good uses; wealth and learning will go out to service.

For Unitarians the standing problem is how to become a vessel unto honour; how to make the most, not of our denomination, but of the treasure committed to us; how to handle our one pound so as to make it five or ten; how to organise and direct our forces to divine ends, and yet keep and deserve the honourable name of "the unsectarian sect." Certainly, the only force that can be relied on to organise and operate a church is the spiritual life. The living body is a mechanism, and vitality is its only creator and motor.

We set up our banner with the flaming words, "Love to God and Love to Man." So much of that love as we really have in our churches and in our hearts will be the exact measure of our zeal and our power. We shall be helpless and worthless, unless we are in vital relation and open communication with that "infinite and eternal Energy from which all things proceed."

Dr. Beyschlag, a German theologian, pronounces Unitarianism fatally defective, as a system of religious faith, because it supplies no means of connection between God and man; it separates them, as he would say, by an impassable gulf, offering no medium by which God can reach man or man can reach God.

In that case the Unitarian Church would indeed be like an empty vessel, or a lamp without flame or oil. We frankly confess our inability to accept an artificial plan of salvation, brought forward, so to speak, as a divine after-thought to fill an equally artificial chasm between Heaven and earth. But we do build on the natural and universal relation between the divine and the human. We rejoicingly believe in the Father's love for His children, even for those who do not know His name. It is as plain to us as to other Christians that all have sinned, and that every sinful soul needs to be reconciled to God; but we dare not say that God needs to be reconciled to man, or that He demands a bleeding victim for a go-between. We say, rather, that when the prodigal is in the far country among the swine, the real reason why he comes to himself and starts for home is because, without his knowing it, the Father's love has held him fast in all his wanderings.

This is our treasure, too; this for us is the fulness of the blessing of the gospel—not that we love God, but that He loves us; that He so loves the world that He calls all mankind to share His purity and peace, not only by the mission and message of Jesus, but by the still, small voice which whispers to every human soul, saying, "This is the way: walk therein."

We dare not limit the expression of a faith so glorious to the dialect of ancient Scriptures. We believe the half has never been told by prophet, apostle, or Messiah; and that, as they forefelt, the Spirit is for ever coming to lead mankind into forms of truth and good of which we do not yet know how to dream.

All souls that struggle and aspire must join in the prayer, "Lord, increase our faith." May it not be that the answer comes, even now, in the unfolding theory of evolution or the spiritual interpretation of all thought and knowledge? Certainly, it is making it possible to trace with new clearness the stately steps of God in history and in our own life. Certainly, it has given us a hint of the largeness of the programme on which creation moves. Certainly, it has lifted high the gates of the present to let the King of Glory in. Quite as certainly, it has taught us that we are only imperfect receivers of the Only Life; and that the exceeding greatness of the Power is of God, and not from ourselves.

Jesus compares the word of life to seed sown in the earth, which is self-multiplied thirty, sixty, or a hundred fold. The law, transformed by its own vital energy from letter to spirit, is transferred from formal tables to the obedient heart. The gospel of the ages is a perpetual germination. The earthen vessels perish; but the treasure, ever increasing, is safely gathered for transmission through new agencies. The Christ after the flesh is known no more; but the Christ of the spirit is continually reincarnate in humanity, and the willing victim of the cross is lifted up wherever sin is put away by sacrifice and souls are redeemed by love. Thus:—

"All the forms are fugitive,
But the substances survive."

* From a sermon preached in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass., May 21, at the seventy-sixth anniversary of the American Unitarian Association.

PEACE MANIFESTOES.

SIR,—I should like a line in explanation, though with no desire for one word of extenuation. Mr. Simon will be glad to hear, I am sure, that the manifesto signed by me, amongst others, was issued when there were rumours of "terms" abroad. If Rumour, infected by South Africa, lied more than usual, it was no fault of mine. It seems ages since I refused to be one of 150 of our ministers who petitioned for cessation of arms. The Boer has been in Natal. Human nature has sometimes to be taken as it is. But, it appeared to me, that if Lord Kitchener, with the concurrence of the Government, allowed the Boer generals to communicate with Holland, it was my duty, if not as an Englishman, then as a Christian, to urge the victors, for the Master's sake, that "the terms should be penetrated with his spirit of peace." I trust I have Mr. Simon with me.

H. D. ROBERTS.

THE International Peace Congress has met in Glasgow this week. On the motion of Miss Ellen Robinson, for the Society of Friends, the Congress affirmed by a large majority:—

That seeing that Christian ethics forbid all hatred, violence, and injustice between man and man, and enjoin brotherhood, sympathy, and love, this Congress is of opinion that persistent efforts should be made to bring home these truths to the rulers and citizens professing the Christian religion, in order to convince them that war and militarism are absolutely opposed to the teaching and spirit of Christ. It calls upon Christian ministers and workers to aid in these efforts.

A CORRESPONDENT calls attention to a mistake made in a leading article of the Daily Graphic of Aug. 27, where there was a reference to "The Case of James Montgomery, whom Macaulay pulverised." It was, of course, the Rev. Robert Montgomery whom Macaulay dealt with, and our correspondent thinks that "this careless insult to a good poet and a good critic ought to be corrected." Macaulay, he adds, "would no more have attacked James Montgomery than he would Cowper or Toplady or Charles Wesley." For Byron's high opinion of Montgomery see his Notes to "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." Having appealed to the Daily Graphic in vain, our friend's indignation finds relief in verse:—

Oh injured Muse! Oh shame of shames!
So to confuse the worth of James
Montgomery with the paltry trash
Macaulay did so maul and smash.

. . . .

E'en Byron, sticking vengeful skewers
Into the thick skulls of Reviewers,
The Sheffield Bard with honour names
And stamps approval on our James.

CHRISTIAN THEISM.

PERHAPS the best way in which I can present what I mean by Christian Theism will be by relating an incident which has set me pondering this question for some time. It is my privilege to count among my friends one of our Professors at Oxford. We were walking together round the Christ Church meadows, discussing Monism in its various aspects, both physical and metaphysical, and seeking to determine where the physical and spiritual really unite. We were both prepared to accept Scientific Monism in its literal meaning, by resolving all matter into a form of force, and all forces into one simple energy. And yet even then our Monism was not complete. What is Energy? What is that of which it is the manifestation? If the scientific student tries to imagine what we call matter as whirls—Light, Electricity, Heat as vibrations—yet what is whirled? What revolves in the ring? What is it of which the wave lengths of varying size or degree of intensity give us what we call light or electricity? What is the somewhat which we can think of as existing? And my friend promptly answered that the ultimate energy or æther, the one existence, is God Himself. Now I suppose that every one of us would feel that we must give the same answer, if we accept, as I suppose we all do accept, the doctrine that God is the Ground and Cause of the Cosmos. And, again, as we probably would accept the Theistic as opposed to the Deistic interpretation of God's relation to the Cosmos—i.e., that God acts from within, and not from without—the Immanence of God will be the fundamental basis of our whole Theology. Yet, granted that we accept the Immanence of God in the sense that God is not an external creative energy, but the immanent life of both Nature and the human soul, yet the one question remains: When we have accepted this doctrine, have we found God in this sense that the perception of God's nearness becomes the one ruling principle and guide of spiritual and moral life? When we have got back to that primitive Æther to declare it God, have we in any sense realised what is meant by "Our Father which art in Heaven"?

I suppose we should all be unanimous in declaring that this is just what we do not mean—that the last thing which we as Theists associate with the thought of God as the Father is All-pervading, Omnipresent, Omnipotent, Energy or Æther, which the scientific student interprets to us as the only possible Monism which Science or Philosophy can accept.

Theism and Pantheism.

This we declare is Pantheism, and not Theism. But can there be a Theism which is not in a very true sense, although not perhaps in the general sense of the term, Pantheism? The very essence of all Theism is that the life and evolution of every object of Nature and of every rational soul implies the indwelling presence and immanent activity of the one life God, which animates and unifies the whole. Nay, more. It is this very thought of the Immanence of God in Nature and in the spirit of man which is taking possession more or less of all forms of religious thoughts, and giving the fresh impulse to Philosophy, to Poetry, to Art. Nay, more; it is this very same thought which is pervading Science also, and altering its whole tone and temper. For certainly there is no conflict at the present time between "Science and Religion." Our scientific men to-day, as a rule, are distinctly Theistic—they are Monistic—and when the ultimate question is asked, Of Mind and Matter, which is prior? their answer is, Mind. Matter can only be objective. But then object cannot exist without a subject to think it. And yet while the whole law of Science is, in this degree, Theistic, it is rather Pantheistic than Theistic in any form of what we would call Christian Theism. Yet why? Pantheism, as the doctrine that God is ground and cause of the whole universe; that all is rooted in Him; and that He is the immediate source of all energy, ought to make the soul declare with Wordsworth:—

> I have felt
> A presence that disturbs me with the joy
> Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
> Of something far more deeply interfused,
> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the round ocean and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
> A motion and a spirit, that impels
> All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
> And rolls through all things.

It is the "vision splendid"—and yet human experience ever repeats itself: that this vision splendid, instead of attending us to be a constant source of spiritual inspiration impelling us Godwards, soon fades into the light of common day.

The Pantheist as Stoic.

For a Theism which is what for convenience I would term Initial Pantheism, in that it starts from a Monism which is God, has ever produced as its one result—not that enthusiasm of Humanity, which is of the very essence of the Christian spirit, but Stoicism. In ancient and in modern times this form of Theism has ever resulted in the doctrine that the noblest attitude of the human soul is that of manly, patient endurance. It has often been a noble doctrine. We have only to turn to the writings of Seneca, Epictetus, or Marcus Aurelius for proof. Hence we find a Morality, as elevated and pure and brave as we can well conceive. Only the message is to those who would learn how to "save their own souls," not lose them for others' sake. Listen to these words of Seneca, quoted by Bishop Lightfoot in his "Philippians":—

"God has a fatherly mind towards good men, and loves them stoutly; and saith He: Let them be harassed with toils, with pains, with losses, that they may gather true strength. . . . Those, therefore, whom God approves, whom He loves, them He hardens, He chastises, He disciplines. . . . It is best to endure what you cannot mend, and without murmuring to attend upon God, by whose ordering all things come to pass. He is a bad soldier who follows his captain complaining."

The ancient Stoicism insisted on the Immanence of God. And no less strongly do its modern representatives. Take the most characteristic of the German stoics—Goethe—and listen how he emphasises this thought in his poem "Gott und Welt":—

> No! such a God my worship may not win,
> Who lets the world about His finger spin
> A thing extern: My God must rule within,
> And whom I own for Father, God, Creator
> Hold Nature in Himself, Himself in Nature,
> And in His kindly arms embraced, the whole
> Doth live and move by His pervading Soul.

Or, again, let us remember how our own great stoic philosopher translates this thought into his own vigorous prose:—

"The Almighty Maker is not like a Clockmaker that once, in old immemorial ages, having made his Horologe of a Universe, sits ever since and sees it go! Not at all. Hence comes Atheism—came, as we say, many other isms; for a man finds, in spite of Bridgewater Bequests, your Clockmaker Almighty an entirely questionable affair—a deniable affair—and accordingly denies it, and along with it so much else. For the faith in an Invisible, Unnameable, Godlike, present everywhere in all that we see and work and suffer, is the essence of all faith whatsoever; and that once denied, or still worse asserted with lips only and out of bound prayer-books only, what other thing remains believable?"

The Cause of this Stoicism.

Now I very much question whether the real answer to this question, why what I would call Initial Theism should thus invariably result in Stoicism, is found where the philosophers and theologians generally place it, in the "abysmal depths of personality." Rather, I believe, the answer is found in something far simpler, something which comes decidedly home to every one of us plain people who are neither philosophers nor professed theologians. The thought of God which is to be an inspiration to us in our moral and spiritual life, so that we shall seek to be sons of our Father which is in Heaven, must be a thought which gives a very precise and definite character to God; so that we shall always be able to present God under one constant thought which shall mean the one constant thing to us.

What is Character?

Now let us ask what precisely do we mean by character. Character is, of course, only predicable of personality. Personality is that which has character. But character is not merely personality; it is ever some definite form of personality by which one person can be distinguished from another person. In all personality there are the same elements of will, thought, and feeling or affection. Personality is self-consciousness and self-conscious self-determination. But in order that personality may become character, some one element or trait must become predominant, and be the "note," as it were, by which all the other traits are to be interpreted. It is the varying proportions in which the same elements of personality are present in all persons which gives each one character and constitutes individuality.

The Character Divine.

Now God is the Source of all personality. It is because we as spirits share in the Eternal Spirit that we have part in this Personality and are persons at all. God alone has true, that is, complete, Personality. Yet in order that that Personality may have any meaning for us, we must be able to think of God as Person—that is, be able to assign Him a definite character. We must be able to distinguish between what we think and call the Character Divine, as clearly marked off from all other types of character which we cannot think divine.

Where Initial Theism Fails.

But this is precisely what Initial Theism does not enable us to do. Among all the attributes which belong of necessity to one who is the Ground and Cause of the Cosmos, there is not some single one which we can mark off and declare, "It is by the help of this one trait I can find the right interpretation of the rest." This type of Pantheism cannot help us to assign any distinct character therefore to God. And do we not find that this is precisely what the great Philosopher of Evolution declares. Herbert Spencer is a Theist. He maintains the Immanence of God in the Cosmos as stoutly as anybody; only then he maintains that God is the One Being, the character of whom cannot be known to us—that is, He is the One who for us has no character at all.

All must grant that He who is the Ground and Cause of the Cosmos must be thought of as Omnipresent, Omnipotent, Omniscient. This is essential to any Philosophy of Religion. Only these attributes never help us to any thought of God which makes Him our Father. It is only when we have gained a knowledge of the Character Divine, that we must enlarge our thought, so that we can think of one to whom we can look up to our Abba Father, as yet as the Ground and Cause of the Cosmos. The men of science have taught us to recognise that force can ever exist, and does exist, although to us it is latent. But not until the latent has became manifest can we recognise it and differentiate it to define it.

Initial Theism—the Pantheism which starts from God as the Ground and Cause of the Cosmos—is Latent Theism. It is not until we have gained such knowledge of God that we are able to assign Him a distinct character—that we have God manifest.

The Teaching of Evolution.

Does it not seem that the great doctrine of Evolution is teaching us just this very thing? The evolution of the Cosmos is from the Homogeneous in which God is latent to the Heterogeneous in which He is to us so manifest. There is as true an immanence of God in the grain of corn as in the ear ripe unto the sickle. But for us there is all the difference. We know not—we could never know—the true value of the seed until the differentiation into root, and blade, and ear has taken place. It is not our knowledge that every man has been born into this world as an infant that limits our conception of the true dignity and truth of the full-grown man. It is as we learn what the full-grown man can be that we understand the infinite value of the child.

How God is Manifest.

And so in our interpretation of God. Not in any form of Theism which presents God as immanent but latent, but in that form of Theism which differentiates Him to assign Him a very distinct character, can we look up to declare Abba Father.

Now Christian Theism means just this differentiation in our thought of God, which makes Him manifest to us because it assigns to Him a very definite and distinct character.

Christian Theism.

It is, of course, here, therefore, that the great and dividing line comes in, and many declare they can no longer claim to be Christian Theists because the Christian limits the Theism and gives a too contracted thought of God. To take any one type of character, and insist that shall be the note of the Character Divine is inconsistent, they assert, with the very basis of Theism, for surely God is present in every human soul. He is equally the soul of all excellence, all perfection. And, as a matter of fact, we have at the present moment distinct forms of Theistic Faith which emphasise what we may call Social Theism, what we may call Æsthetic Theism, what again I would term Veracious Theism—with what result? Why, that history repeats itself. We may gain—and do gain—Anthropomorphic Deity, but just in that proportion do we lose sight of Theomorphic Humanity.

Christian Theism—and Christian Theism alone—does give us a Theomorphic Humanity. It is in Christian Theism that we have presented that type of character which is at once Son of Man and Son of God: that character which is that of the full-grown man, and also that which can be expanded so that, without placing any limits on the Being of God, it can be interpreted as the very character of God Himself. For what is the first note of Christian Theism? It is that God is our Father: not us—we are of God, but not God. As Browning puts it in his "Christmas Eve":—

> God, whose pleasure brought
> Man into being, stands away,
> As it were, a hand-breadth off, to give
> Room for the newly-made to live,
> And look at Him from a place apart,
> And use his gifts of brain and heart.

And, therefore, in Christian Theism, the more distinctly we recognise the Personality of God the more conscious do we become of our own personality.

> Our wills are ours, we know not how;
> Our wills are ours, to make them thine.

Through Self-Discipline and Self-Forgetfulness to God.

But Christian experience ever declares that we can only make our wills one with God's by the most strenuous efforts of our soul. It is by the exercise of the best and noblest elements of our own personality that we become conscious that it is God who worketh in us, both to will and to work for His good pleasure. The more the Christian disciple recognises that it is no longer the "old man" that lurks in Him, but that he has become the new creature, the more distinctly he is conscious of the presence of God in his own soul, the more distinctly conscious is he of the distinction between God and his soul—in this, that the soul is never so absorbed with Deity that it becomes Deity, becomes self-sufficient for itself. Its cry is never "Lord, I thank Thee that I am Thou," but ever "Lord, be merciful to me who looks up to Thee for all I would become." The Christian is ever bidden to lose his own life; lose, that is, all the petty aims which end in self, in order that he may find the true self—the self which can rest in God; but to find this true self, he must ever deny himself and take up the cross and follow the Master in active service.

Contrasted with Hindoo Pantheism.

Herein lies the contrast between the character of the Christian disciple and the character of the Hindoo Pantheist: the first seeks to make his will God's by using it as much as possible in the Divine service, making his will the sword of the spirit; the second seeks to make his will God's by never consciously using it at all, by never seeking to will anything at all, but allow his whole energy to be absorbed in the contemplation of the Absolute.

The Mind of the Master.

There is no personality which for the Christian disciple stands out so distinct and definite as that of the Master. There is no character of which we are more sure that we can declare: "This is Christlike," "That is the last thing which Christ would approve." It is the character of one who fully gave himself away in order to make others share in all that was best, was Divine in himself. Christ presents us with the character which seeks to realise itself by making other characters like unto his own. It is through the Cross that Christ becomes the ransom for many. The disciple seeks, therefore, to lose the self-centred self, to find he gains the God-centred life; he gains such a clear knowledge of his own personality that he is sure that that personality has become permanent. As he makes his will God's, he finds that that will is his to make God's not for time but eternity.

True Communion with God.

As Christian Theism gains this definite knowledge of the Character Divine, its Theism assumes another note. God is the ground and cause of the Cosmos—yes, because there is nothing in all the Cosmos which cannot and will not ultimately become a manifestation of the true mind of God. But we distinguish between God as latent and God as manifest. Christian Theism beholds in the Universe how God is seeking, by the creation of that which is other than Himself, to beget that which shall be the manifestation of His own character, not that which shall simply reflect that character. God does not seek for a mirror in which He shall behold the reflection of Himself: He seeks a son which shall offer Him the friendship of a perfect sympathy. It is that He may beget offspring who shall have a very true and real personality, that He demands that human souls learn the discipline of the Cross, and thus become his sons.

> This is the glory, that in all conceived,
> Or felt or known, I recognise a mind
> Not mine but like mine, for the double joy—
> Making all things for me, and me for Him.

Christian Theism is as Browning declares:—

> I say, the acknowledgment of God in Christ,
> Accepted by thy reason, solves for thee
> All questions in the earth and out of it."

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

BY THE REV. TONY ANDRÉ, OF FLORENCE.*

II.

Liberalism among Catholics.

If there is no Liberal Protestant movement, we must not expect to find much more among the Catholics.

In the countries of Northern Europe and in France the clergy occupy themselves with religious questions, following, at least at a distance, the progressive Protestants; and, by their study, some of them emancipate themselves intellectually and spiritually. In Italy this impulse is lacking. The stimulus can only come from without, and in traversing the snowy summits of the Alps it is cooled down considerably. The result is that we must not seek among the Italian clergy for any traces of a movement, properly so called, for theological reform. It is not impossible that, in the secrecy of the closet, some minds may be agitated by questions touching a whole range of opinions, or that critical examination may go beyond certain points of detail; but nothing is manifest to the outside world except here and there petty acts of independence which do not commit any one much. There are, no doubt, a few priests who are bolder in their assertions, and these assertions might have far-reaching consequences; but Rome watches, Rome is clear-sighted, and allows nothing to pass which goes beyond the semblance of liberty that she grants; or if powerful influences have been brought into play to save a courageous pamphlet from the Index and from condemnation, Rome takes care that such a pamphlet shall be the first and the last, and its influence is lost by not being followed up.

Whatever may be the value of these modest manifestations, they must not be regarded as an approximation to Protestants. All Catholic writers who have had occasion to refer to the subject reject the suggestion, and I believe they are right. What they would desire to see is a progressive movement of the Catholic Church, effected by its own forces, entirely for its own profit. Instead of remaining Catholics tied to the ancient traditions and ancient modes of action, they would wish to become enlightened Catholics—that is all.

The Reformed Catholic Church of Italy.

It might seem, at first sight, that a place set apart should be reserved for the Reformed Catholic Church of Italy, founded by Count Enrico di Campello, ex-canon of the Basilica of St. Peter of the Vatican. It is a branch of Old Catholicism. Its centres are to be found at Arrone (near Terni), at Dovadola (near Forlì), at S. Angelo dei Lombardi (near Avellino), and at San Remo. A station was opened, a year and half ago, at Rome itself. This movement, however, promising though it appeared at first, makes no progress; and quite recently there has been an important secession from its ranks. While Count di Campello was introducing the forms of Anglican Ritualism, the congregation at San Remo—or at any rate the greater part of it—has gone over to Protestantism, together with its minister, Signor Ugo Janni. The latter, the founder and editor of the Labaro, an independent journal advocating religious reform in Italy, deserves to arrest our attention for a few moments.

Ugo Janni.

His desire is to work for the reconciliation of faith and science by separating clearly their respective fields of action, the task of faith being to direct the moral consciousness towards God and the invisible world which science is incapable of grasping, while science remains absolutely free to study matter, its properties and forces, and the laws that govern it. Nevertheless religion, enriched by the conclusions of science, should march hand in hand with progress, to bring about a profound, radical reform, a transformation of Christianity, which should not be a new religion, but should give Christians that which modern society needs—the revelation of revelation. In short, no irreligious and superficial rationalism, but the "rationale obsequium" which does not mutilate man but respects all his marvellous energies, all his inalienable rights. Such are the aims of Ugo Janni, now a pastor of the Waldensian Church. If I speak of him here, it is because his secession from the Reformed Catholic Church only dates from this year, and it is impossible as yet to know the part he will play among his new co-religionists.

Miràglia.

Another movement, very similar to Old Catholicism, is that of Dom Paolo Miraglia, at Piacenza. Miraglia, with his piercing eye and energetic features, reminded one somewhat of Savonarola, or recalled his memory by the boldness of his first declarations. He was already being greeted as the coming Reformer, about to revolutionise Italy, when his desire to lead an independent movement, after separating him from the Old Catholics whose ideas were akin to his, threw him suddenly into a false path. On May 6, 1900, he had himself consecrated Bishop of Piacenza by Monsignor Villatte. This step lost him the sympathy of many, and his profession of faith completed their disappointment.

I, the undersigned (so we read it) declare and avow that I hold the Catholic faith intact, as it is prescribed and formulated in the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, and I accept also all the Œcumenical Councils. . . . . I will preserve intact the doctrine of the Council of Trent in all that concerns the definitions or explanations touching the Seven Sacraments (and so on).

Add to this that a lawsuit, followed by a sentence desired by the clericals, has obliged Dom Miraglia to take refuge abroad. His reform movement, therefore, is now in suspense.

Let us pass on to the official clergy.

The Clergy and the Roman Question.

The religious question is singularly complicated by a very important circumstance: I refer to its connection with politics. King Victor Emmanuel, in establishing himself at Rome, the capital of the kingdom, placed many souls in a state of great embarrassment. A portion of the clergy still protests against the usurpation; the rest accept the new situation of the Pope, and, giving up all idea of a restoration of the temporal power, declare themselves sincerely devoted to their country. The former are called "Clericals," the latter "Liberals." When, therefore, one hears the Liberal clergy spoken of one must think before all of the "Roman question." Still, it is just in this section that we shall look also for independence of thought, for those of the clergy who do not work for the cause of the temporal power have little chance of being raised to high offices; they accordingly devote their attention to literature, to teaching, to the cure of souls, and their contact with the Socialist movement sometimes gives them an original turn.

In this respect the North of Italy, and especially Milan, are particularly interesting. At Milan the Ambrosian ritual continues to give a peculiar stamp to religious life. The old clergy, who were trained in the school of Rosmini and took part in the struggles for independence, do not submit blindly to all the pretensions of the Holy See. If they obey the religious authority in its own domain they wish to be free to love their country and to exercise their rights as citizens. The younger clergy, it is true, are urged on to fanaticism by the clerical journals, but ideas have moved on, and there is no lack of priests who no longer believe in the efficacy of the "Non expedit" of Papal policy.

Pietro Stoppani.

P. Pietro Stoppani is an honourable representative of this Liberal tendency.

When (says he) the temporal power shall no more be spoken of in the Church and the Vatican Court shall have ceased to exist; when the bishops and high dignitaries shall be chosen from among the most learned and most saintly ecclesiastics; when a greater independence shall be granted to study; and when complete liberty of thought and of civil action shall be accorded to citizens—then the condition of the Church in Italy will improve. To-day it is discouraging; but it is evident that, by the force of events rather than by the will of man, a change for the better is being prepared.

Pietro Stoppani has proved the sincerity of his opinions. Last September, when commemorating King Humbert, he had the courage publicly to denounce the miserable opposition of the Vatican to the funeral of the murdered king and to Queen Margaret's prayer; he characterised this opposition as a "Pharisaic malaria," which infuriated the Clericals. I may add that Pietro Stoppani, who is the nephew of the famous geologist, Antonio Stoppani, in studying religious questions vindicates the legitimate claims of history, of science, in a word, of reason, and combines with his independence of mind a truly Christian religious sentiment, which wins our personal sympathy.

Sympathy with Americanism.

It is at Milan too that "Americanism" is in favour. Monsignor Ireland's ideas have been received with approval; I refer, of course, to his earlier ideas, for his later evolution has caused bitter disappointment; and Spalding's writings are likely to be substituted for his. The translation of his principal work is about to appear—if it has not already appeared—under the title of "Opportunity," and is likely to have a large number of readers.

Nevertheless, except for a few men like Stoppani, whose thought goes out beyond this limited horizon, the political and patriotic question is dominant. It was necessary to speak of it briefly. Unless

* A Paper read to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, at Essex Hall, on Friday afternoon, May 31. Some passages from Mr. André's paper we are obliged to omit on account of its length, but the whole will appear in the forthcoming volume.

the Vatican ceases to claim the temporal power and to combat the Italian Government, I am convinced that all that section of the clergy which is devoted to the king will become accustomed to look with less confidence to the Holy See, and the authority of the Pope, weakened in their eyes, at one point, will lose something of its strength and its necessity in the domain of dogma and of theology. The claims of science only come into consideration in the second place.

Towards Moral and Social Reform.

But we will leave these considerations which lead to conjectures, always risky, about the future. On a much smaller scale, there is already at present among the clergy a certain movement towards independence, which touches our subject more closely. It shows itself in desires for reform. And these aspirations for reform among the clergy have a double source: their origin is in some cases moral and social, in others scientific.

I will explain my meaning. Some of the clergy would wish to give religious life to their churches and to bring the indifferent back to the altar. They are tender-hearted ecclesiastics who follow the current of modern thought a little—but as little as possible—in order to attract modern souls, who lay less stress on certain dogmas for fear of giving offence to waverers, who take an interest in social questions and in the working classes, with the secret hope of curbing them with the bonds of the church—in short, they are ecclesiastics whom the cure of souls has in some slight degree emancipated from scholasticism and dry dogmatism. Several of them are also moved to activity by the wish not to leave all philanthropic and social work in the hands of the Protestants.

Among these men, without attempting to classify shades of opinion, I may name Bishop Bonomelli, of Milan, who goes among the working men in order to combat socialism, and a young priest of Rome, Romolo Murri, editor of the Cultura Sociale. Romolo Murri has written several pamphlets for the people, and aims at a Christian State, in which the Church, though exercising it influence everywhere, should have no temporal power.

Father Giovanni Semeria, a Barnabite, insists on the necessity of religious life. He says that a man may accept the whole series of dogmas without having the slightest doubt about them, and yet not be a Christian: true Christianity must be lived. And he is not alone in proclaiming the insufficiency of a purely external religion.

* * * * *

Progress of Scientific Thought.

The second class of prudently independent ecclesiastics comprise those who interest themselves in the progress of science. They are often men of culture, they study foreign authors and do not disdain Protestant writers. The abbé Antonio Rosmini, who died in 1855, was the founder of a school. In Milan there is still a group of priests who follow the master's method, and endeavour to bring men of science back to religion, and Catholics back to science. Their leading representative is Padre Morando, a cultured and honourable man. The Rosminians frequently meet together for discussion, but, being harassed and persecuted, they are no longer able to play an important part; and though they have a printing office of their own, they write little. To give an idea of the annoyances to which men of any independence of thought are exposed, it will suffice to mention, as one instance among many, what happened three years ago to Father Giovanni Genocchi. Cardinal Parocchi had appointed Genocchi professor of the Sacred Scriptures at the Roman Seminary. The new professor at once manifested a certain freedom in his manner of teaching, with the result that after one year he was turned out of his office, and, to prevent complaints, the chair was abolished. There was then a Catholic Biblical Society at Rome, in which questions concerning the Sacred Books were studied by ecclesiastics. But "study" is scarcely the appropriate word. Genocchi, who was a member of the society, thought he might venture to lay before his colleagues the ideas of father Legrange on the "Sources of the Pentateuch," as put forth in a paper read by the latter at the Catholic Congress at Fribourg in 1897. This simple exposition, which was not a very alarming one, so scandalised these good Roman priests that they dismissed Genocchi from their society. Soon after, in order to prevent the repetition of similar scandals, they dissolved the society itself.

An Italian Version of the Gospels.

Salvatore Minocchi, a young doctor of divinity, and an accomplished scholar, did not hesitate to take part in the last Congress of Orientalists, a mortal offence in the eyes of the Sovereign Pontiff. He has already published several valuable essays, always, however, using the greatest prudence in order not to shock the ecclesiastical authorities. I will only mention two of his publications—first, his Italian version of the Gospels, which is the first part of a complete translation of the Bible, the object of which is to bring science and faith into harmony, and to put the results of critical studies within the reach of Italian Catholics. In a brief introduction, he asserts, contrary to tradition, that the Gospel of Mark is the earliest in date, and that Matthew was preceded by an Aramaic original. While following the text of the Vulgate, he has recourse to the Greek to explain several obscure passages, e.g., Matt. vi. 11 (panem supersubstantialem), and Luke xi. 3 (panem quotidianum), translated by "pane necessario." Elsewhere, e.g., Luke ii. 14, x. 41, 42), the notes fix the best Greek text, or imply (Matt. xxvii., 35; John v. 4, vii., 53—viii. 11; Mark xvi. 9—19) that passages have been interpolated, concerning the authenticity of which doubts are permitted, though here Minocchi is less categorical than in his articles in the Reviews. Further, I know on good authority that the manuscript contained a much greater number of important changes. For instance, the famous "gratia plena" (Luke i. 28) was rendered "graziata," i.e., "favoured by the divine grace" (Eph. i. 6), and the following clause, "benedicta tu in mulieribus," was marked as lacking in critical authority. But Rome has obliged him to tone down many passages; and this is the only possible explanation of doctrinal notes that contradict the translation itself.

* * * * *

The men I have named are certainly not the only ones; but they are, I believe, the most active.

Why are there so few of them?

The want of money, the necessity of gaining one's livelihood, the lower intellectual standard, as compared with other countries, the insufficiency of previous preparation, the absence of readers who take an interest in religious questions, the climate itself, which produces an easy-going carelessness—all these things may do their part; but the great obstacle, I might say the only serious obstacle, is the Vatican and the power of the Jesuits. The working clergy are ruled from above, watched and spied, and cannot move freely.

On the day when the Vatican would cease to restrict liberty of thought, we should see a vast number of original thinkers and writers come rapidly forward, for Italy, the classic land of the Renaissance, bears within it potentially a productive intellectual power, which is now only lying dormant.

For the present, we scarcely read anything beyond essays in historical criticism, where the documents, of which the authenticity cannot be denied, serve as evidence, and constitute a force and a weapon.

(To be concluded.)

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

OF the September Reviews we have found the Contemporary much the richest in interest. It opens with a trenchant article by M. de Bloch on "The Wars of the Future," in which the moral of his great work on "The War of the Future" is driven home by the fresh experiences of the conflict in South Africa. He shows once more, both from the military and the economic point of view, how all the conditions of modern warfare are changed, and how a great war in Europe, even if it could be waged and brought to a conclusion, would be only less ruinous to the victor than to the conquered nation; and he appeals from the military caste to the people, who have to bear the burden of the present enormous armaments, and must use their power to insist that international differences shall be settled in a more humane and reasonable way. War is now much more an international concern than in the past.

War itself is no longer the exclusive concern of the belligerents. It is an international calamity, and even now some of its worst effects have to be warded off or assuaged by international pressure put upon the belligerents, as, for instance, in the questions of determining what may be declared contraband of war, what reasons can justify the stoppage and overhauling of neutral vessels, &c. From this it is but a step to the prohibition of certain wars altogether by the majority of nations on the ground of the widespread calamities that would follow in their train. And this thin end of the wedge once driven in, the remainder would follow in due course. If a Peace Congress cannot compass the end, the force of circumstances will and must. For the vital interests of nations are all closely interwoven as they never were before, and, like people joining hands with him who receives an electric spark into his body, they all feel the shock. As soon as they perceive that the hardship is more than they can reasonably be expected to bear, they will find ways and means of putting a speedy end to the war, whatever the belligerents may think and feel on the subject.

In connection with M. de Bloch's article, it is instructive to read that by Mr. E. Wake Cook on "The Organisation of Mankind," inspired by Fichte's ideal of human progress, but urging patience with the slow growth of the moral ideal in humanity.

Whenever our high purposes fail, or move limpingly, the inference is, not that God has lost His grip of the world, but that we have failed to discern His plan, and are putting right things in the wrong order. His work always prospers, and ours will prosper too, if we take our tasks in the right sequence.

But because "world-wide organisation and unlimited inter-communication" seem to be now a part of the Divine purpose for mankind, that does not justify a war that ought to have been avoided, and in place of which a wiser and more humane method might have attained (and very likely more speedily and effectually) the desired end.

Another interesting article is "The Message of India," by Mr. Charles Johnston, which pictures for us the great diversity of the races in that great dominion, the black, the yellow, the red, and the white, this last being not the European rulers, but the Brahmans. The message of India Mr. Johnston finds in the greater sensitiveness of those races, and especially the red Rajputs to the subtler influences of the spiritual life; but the latter part of the article dealing with this subject is not so clear and explicit as we could wish. The Rev. W. W. Peyton has a second article on "Anthropology and the Evolution of Religion," in which he points to the poverty of the Anthropologists' analysis of religion, who will not take into account the significance of its later developments, and using the analogy of evolution in the natural world, he deals in an extremely suggestive manner with the unfolding of religious thought, from its early beginnings in primitive man to the fulness of Christian faith. That the "sacrifice" of Christ will bear all the weight that Mr. Peyton puts upon it, we are not prepared to admit, but his treatment of the subject, and especially of the place of sacrifice in primitive religions, cannot fail to stimulate serious thought. A second article on "The Billion Dollar Trust," and a memorial article on the Italian statesman and patriot, Francesco Crispi, are also noteworthy.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Auberon Herbert concludes his essay on "Assuming the Foundations," and there is one of Prince Kropotkin's interesting articles on "Recent Science." Jonkheer Van Citters, dealing with the industrial future of South Africa, offers "An Alternative to Kaffir Labour," writing from personal knowledge of the great natural resources of the country and the unsatisfactory character of the black labourer, and urging that it would be far more profitable, as well as a benefit to the people themselves, to introduce European labourers; and as the most hopeful source whence such labourers might be drawn, and the country most needing such relief, he mentions South Italy.

In the Monthly Review Mr. W. H. Mallock gives good reason for declining to believe in "The Alleged Economic Decay of Great Britain." A most curious article, which will be attractive to members of the Psychical Research Society and others with leanings that way, is "Magic," by Mr. W. B. Yeats. The illustrated article this month is Edith Sichel's study of "A Woman-Painter and Symbolism," the subject being Miss Fortescue-Brickdale.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Thousand Years Ago.

II.

"He who would have full power, must first strive to get power over his own mind."—Alfred the Great.

On the slope of one of the hills in Berkshire, the figure of a giant horse is carved out of the turf. Below the turf which covers the hill lies chalk, and the horse, which is 374 feet long, is very huge and very white, and can be seen from far away. A valley called the "White Horse Vale" lies below the hill, and once a year some of the people who live there climb the hill, carrying with them spades and brushes, and they set to work to remove any grass which may have grown over the white horse and to clear its outline if, in any part, the rain has brought down soil and made the edges indistinct. They are a busy company on that hill-side, and they are proud and glad to scour and clear, for the horse is a national monument and was cut out, it is said, more than a thousand years ago, in memory of a victory which Alfred the Great won over the Danes.

It was a terrible battle which this monument records. An old chronicle of the time tells us "such slaughter was never known since the Saxons first gained England by their arms." Alfred was then an uncrowned prince, leading his countrymen against the fierce pirates from the shores of the Baltic Sea, who were trying to conquer our island. Danes and Saxons, with savage war-cries, trampled the bodies of their fallen companions under foot, as they fought in close conflict round a stunted thorn tree on the top of that Berkshire hill. At last, the Danes gave way and fled, hotly pursued and slaughtered by their conquerors.

Do you remember what calamities the Danes brought upon England? Picture them—blood-thirsty Sea-Kings with their fierce followers sailing up the rivers in their black boats, and then dashing over the country, burning the homes of the people, carrying away treasures from the monasteries, and killing men, women, and children, or dragging them away as slaves. They not only laid waste the land; they also ruined, for a time, the character of the people of England. Religion, good laws, teachers, the love of work—all that was best in life—disappeared before those invaders from the North. When Alfred's little kingdom was at last cleared of the Danes, what was the condition of his own subjects? The children were ignorant and idle, growing up with no one to teach them; their fathers were little better than barbarians, and what they could do best was to fight enemies as barbarous as themselves.

A thousand years ago people knew no better way to settle disputes than by war; and even now in these later days we are sometimes apt to think that bold fighting and the strong will that forces its way, whether that way be right or wrong, are marks of a hero. But really the greatest power in the world is the power of a noble character, and the true heroes are those who do not seek their own ends and their own wishes, but learn to govern their tempers and to live to do only what is best and wisest. King Alfred knew this when he said, "He who would have full power must first strive to get power over his own mind."

We have better reasons than his valour as a warrior for giving to King Alfred the title of "The Great." We have heard of the "White Horse," the national monument which reminds us how he conquered the Danes. Now here is another story of the King which records something far grander than a victory in battle. There came a day after a long, weary struggle against the Danes, when Guthrum, their leader, and all his host were defeated, and Alfred could make what terms he chose with his fallen foe. Now the King could have his revenge, if he chose, for all the evil the Danes had done; now he could make his victory a step to his own advancement, and could go on to conquer back the whole country, and make himself King from North to South. But no! Alfred lived for the good of his people. He longed for peace that he might have time to make wise laws for them, and to establish schools and find teachers for his ignorant subjects. So he made a treaty with Guthrum, gave him half the land, and said to him, "Let the past be forgotten. Let Dane and Saxon settle down side by side in peace, and become in time one nation."

See how the King put aside all thought of self, and all personal aims and ambitions. He had indeed "power over his own mind." Alfred loved peace; but that was not because he lacked courage. "No man should desire a soft life," was one of his sayings, and he never ceased fighting; but it was the right kind of fighting. He fought against sin, and ignorance, and idleness. We can tell that he was truly brave from another fact that history has preserved for us about him. He had a mysterious disease for which, in those days, no cure was known, and every day he suffered from long attacks of severe pain. Yet he was never idle. His days were spent in study, in translating and writing books, and in other labours for the good of his people; and he made wise laws for them and travelled about his kingdom to see that justice was done to the poorest and most helpless.

"Power is never a good unless he be good that hath it." This was another of the sayings of King Alfred, and it was because he was good that we who live a thousand years after him call him "The Great."

FRANCES E. COOKE.

In response to our note of last week we have received several translations of the Latin epitaph in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth (for all of which, many thanks!), and we propose in our issue of Sept. 28 to publish the best version that, with this help, we are able to produce. One correspondent, who is unable to refer to THE INQUIRER of Oct. 27, 1900 (page 695), asks for the reference to the epitaph in Wordsworth's prose works. It will be found in the second volume of Professor Knight's edition, among a number of notes on epitaphs. Wordsworth quotes an English version, which, however, is not complete, and adds a regret that he has not seen the original.

THE ALFRED COMMEMORATION.

THE national commemoration of KING ALFRED, which is to be held during the coming week at Winchester, the capital of his old kingdom of Wessex, should remind people of the English race throughout the world how singularly happy we are in the hero whose figure stands out so nobly, though separated from us by a thousand years, the earliest glory of our history, yet still very near to us, in the graces of his character and all the essential qualities of his manhood, the very type of what an Englishman should be.

ALFRED "the Truth-teller," "England's Darling"—so the people spoke of him long before a later generation began to call him "the Great." But no title can express what he is to us, and what we owe to him, ALFRED, the noblest of our Kings, the lover of his country, the friend of the people. "His memory," wrote JOHN RICHARD GREEN, "has come down to us with a living distinctness through the mists of exaggeration and legend which time gathered round it. The instinct of the people has clung to him with a singular affection. The love which he won a thousand years ago has lingered round his name from that day to this. While every other name of those earlier times has all but faded from the recollection of Englishmen, that of ALFRED remains familiar to every English child."

And it is well that now attention should be once more concentrated on this man. Earlier in the year our hearts were deeply stirred by the passing of our beloved QUEEN, and we were made to realise, as never before, what we have owed to her long reign and the graces of her true womanhood. She could trace back her descent, through all the generations, to this ALFRED, who had died a thousand years before, when he was hardly more than fifty, and had reigned not for sixty but for little more than twenty years, over only a small part of the home island, a very little thing compared to the vast dominion of our QUEEN. Yet if she was our ideal QUEEN in these modern days, he stands alone among the Kings; and if we should ask of the lineage of VICTORIA, to whom it was her greatest honour to be kin, there could be but one answer—ALFRED, the West Saxon King.

In him we see how, in the old barbarous days, a King was obliged to fight, but also how a King could treat his enemies, and with what unwearying persistence and self-sacrifice he could pursue the higher ends of his kingship. And it is not only as a King that we see him peerless; the historians vie with one another in their enthusiastic eulogy of the man.

"ALFRED," said FREEMAN, in the opening chapter of his "Norman Conquest," "is the most perfect character in history."

He is a singular instance of a prince who has become a hero of romance, who, as a hero of romance, has had countless imaginary exploits and imaginary institutions attributed to him, but to whose character romance has done no more than justice, and who appears in exactly the same light in history and fable. No other man on record has ever so thoroughly united all the virtues both of the ruler and the private man. In no other man on record were so many virtues disfigured by so little alloy. A saint without superstition, a scholar without ostentation, a warrior all whose wars were fought in the defence of his country, a conqueror whose laurels were never stained by cruelty, a prince never cast down by adversity, never lifted up to insolence in the hour of triumph—there is no other name in history to compare with his.

And in a strain of admiration, not less glowing and sincere, GREEN wrote in his "History of the English People":—

Alfred was the noblest as he was the most complete embodiment of all that is great, of all that is loveable, in the English temper. He combined, as no other man has ever combined, its practical energy, its profound sense of duty, the reserve and self-control that steadies in it the wide outlook and the restless daring, its temperance and fairness, its frank geniality, its sensitiveness to affection, its poetic tenderness, its deep and passionate religion. Religion was indeed the groundwork of Alfred's character. His temper was instinct with piety. Everywhere throughout his writings that remain to us the name of God, the thought of God, stir him to outbursts of ecstatic adoration. But he was no mere saint. He felt none of that scorn of the world about him which drove the nobler souls of his day to monastery or hermitage. Vexed as he was by sickness and constant pain, his temper took no touch of asceticism. His rare geniality, the peculiar elasticity and mobility of nature, gave colour and charm to his life. A sunny frankness and openness of spirit breathes in the pleasant chat of his books, and as he was in his books he showed himself in his daily converse.

And in "The Conquest of England," in which this eulogy is also to be found, in a somewhat different form, GREEN adds:—

His practical energy found scope for itself in a material and administrative restoration of the wasted land; his intellectual energy breathed fresh life into education and literature; while his capacity for inspiring trust and affection drew the hearts of Englishmen to a common centre, and began the upbuilding of a new England. Little by little men came to recognise in Alfred a ruler of higher and nobler stamp than the world had seen. Never had it seen a king who lived only for the good of his people. Never had it seen a ruler who set aside every personal aim to devote himself solely to the welfare of those whom he ruled. It was this grand self-mastery that won him love and reverence in his own day, and it is this that has hallowed his memory ever since.

In Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON'S lecture at Harvard on "The Writings of King Alfred," we find the following passage:—

Of Alfred the man, the warrior, the statesman, the hero, the saint, I will not now speak. In each of these characters he was perfect—the purest, grandest, most heroic soul that ever sprang from our race. It is only of Alfred the writer of books, the creator of Saxon prose, that I wish to speak. He was indeed one of those rare rulers of men who trust to the book as much as to the sword, who value the school more than the court, who believe in no force but the force of thought and of truth.

And in an earlier essay on "Alfred as King" in the Mayor of Winchester's Commemorative volume, Mr. HARRISON has this other reference to the King as a writer:—

It is in his own writings that we come to love Alfred best. No ruler of men has left us so pellucid a revelation of his own soul. As in Meditations of Aurelius and the Psalms of David, there is given to men the outpourings of his aspirations and his sorrows. Neither Richelieu, Cromwell, nor William the Silent ever recorded more frankly their problems and their aims. In the authentic writings of Alfred we are in the presence of one who is a teacher as much as a king—who recalls to us Augustine and à Kempis, or Bunyan and Jeremy Taylor. His "Boethius" served him as texts whereon he preached to his people profound sermons on the moral and spiritual life. Read his homily on Riches—"that it is better to give than to receive,"—on the true Ruler—"that power is never a good, unless he be good that has it,"—on the uses of Adversity—"no wise man should desire a soft life." Few men ever had so hard a life—with his mysterious and cruel malady—"his thorn in the flesh" until his early death—with his distracted and ruined kingdom—his ferocious enemies—his never-ending cares.

And amidst it all we have the King in his silent study pouring out poetic thoughts upon married love, or friendship, on true happiness, or the inner life, composing pastoral poetry, or casting into English old idylls from Greek epic or myth, ending with some magnificent Te Deum of his own composition.

Of ALFRED'S writings we are happy to be able to offer our readers a much fuller account in Mr. WICKSTEED'S article which follows this, but here we cannot refrain from adding one more passage from Mr. FREDERIC HARRISON'S eloquent tribute :—

Of all the names in history there is only our English Alfred whose record is without stain and without weakness—who is equally amongst the greatest of men in genius, in magnanimity, in valour, in moral purity, in intellectual force, in practical wisdom, and in beauty of soul. In his recorded career from infancy to death, we can find no single trait that is not noble and suggestive, nor a single act or word that can be counted as a flaw.

Alfred was a victorious warrior whose victories have left no curses behind them; a king whom no man ever charged with a harsh act: a scholar who never became a pedant: a saint who knew no superstition: a hero as bold as Launcelot—as spotless as Galahad.

This man was King among our people a thousand years ago. We must indeed wish for the honour of England that her ALFRED may not be forgotten, and that the ideal of his manhood may once more and with a new and inspiring urgency of appeal kindle the admiration of our statesmen and of every citizen who desires the true greatness of his country and the welfare of the people.

For this commemoration we will, in conclusion, recall some verses by one of our veteran poets, THOMAS HORNBLOWER GILL, from a poem written many years ago, on Alfred the Great, and included in his volume of "Anniversaries" :—

O bring the fulness of thy heart to-day!
Thy tenderest song, enamoured England, sing!
O let no glorious passion keep away,
No strongly smitten chord refuse to ring!

Win from each glory of thy raiment bright
A strain from him of old who robëd thee!
Yes, pour o'er all thy beauty and thy might
A sweet strain of melodious memory!

Still gracious in thy sight abides thy throne?
Thy saint, thy sage, thy hero was thy king:
Not all the tyrants that have sate thereon,
Have worn away thine Alfred's hallowing.

. . . . . .

Muse, as thy Souls of Light thou countest o'er,
How his own time's thick gloom thine Alfred rent!
Bless that strange radiance! marvel at that lore
So greatly gathered, so divinely spent!

Sing how thy war-worn guardian sweetly strove
With his soul's sweat thy sluggish soul to wake!
How thy great Lover in his height of love
Lent of his light thee beautiful to make!

Let loose thy heart! thou hast not here to grieve
O'er some grand sinner whom thou canst not hate;
Yes, with the world's and with the Saviour's leave
Doth happy England call her Alfred great.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

AN angry monk of Abingdon, penning his chronicle, denounced Afred as "a Judas amongst the twelve Apostles, heaping crime upon crime," for robbing (as he said) the monks of their monastery. What the rights or wrongs of the matter where it is impossible to determine; but as the circumstance took place in the thick of the Danish wars, and it appears really to have been the Danes who destroyed the monastery, though Alfred subsequently occupied the land, it has been very reasonably conjectured that the measure, whatever it was, may have been dictated by the exigencies of military defence. In any case the monk of Abingdon enjoys the distinction of being the only person whom the utmost diligence of historians has been able to unearth who ever spoke a single word in detraction of Alfred; and when we remember that even St. Louis of France was taxed on one occasion by his clergy with "destroying Christianity in his realm," we need not attach too much weight to this solitary utterance of the devil's advocate in plea against Alfred. But, unfortunately, whereas St. Louis had a Joinville to tell the story of his life, and to sketch his character (relating, with great humour, the occasion of this very charge, amongst other things) Alfred only had a Bishop Asser to trace his likeness—a man constitutionally incapable of catching the characteristics of a situation or telling a plain tale for posterity. If only Bede had lived after Alfred, or Alfred before Bede, we should have known Alfred as we know (or may know, if we like) St. Louis. As it is, the student of English history is too often baffled in his attempts to realise the great king's personality. His achievement is solid and tangible enough. It is recorded with admirable conciseness in the inscription beneath his statue at Wantage, which, unhappily, we can only quote (or misquote) from memory: "Alfred found learning dead, and he revived it; education neglected, and he restored it; the Church degraded, and he raised it up; the Laws powerless, and he gave them force; the land ravaged by a fearful enemy, from which he delivered it." But the personality of the man with this record seems to evade us by its symmetrical perfection, and Asser does not help us; for, though he preserves a number of more or less interesting anecdotes, he has not the artist's touch which makes a portrait live.

On the other hand, we are singularly fortunate in possessing a body of literature from Alfred's own hand. It is mostly translation, but the translations are free. Bits of his own work are interwoven into nearly all of them; and sometimes he breaks away from his original altogether, and gives us his own thoughts or observations in perfect directness and simplicity. In the few words we have to say in this article, we shall attempt to show what light we may gain from this source on Alfred's character. We may gather from the confused and ambiguous statements of Asser, together with certain inferences from other sources, that Alfred began to study Latin, and to translate it into Anglo-Saxon for his own personal benefit, in the year 887, just in the lull between the two great periods of struggle with the Danes.

Alfred had a genuine passion for literature, especially religious and edifying literature—Augustine, Gregory, and afterwards Boethius, being apparently his favourites. It was his delight at every moment of leisure to have passages from their works read, translated and expounded to him by the scholars of his Court. He came to them with that wonderful freshness and zest which we often observe in a man of strong intellectual character, whose life has been chiefly lived out of doors and in immediate contact with the basal facts of life. Alfred's phraseology at every turn smacks of the woodman, the craftsman, the hunter, and the warrior. The works of Augustine, for instance, struck him as a great forest in every tree of which his eye detected the potentiality of a goodly shaft, of a bolt or bar, of a pillar or a roof-tree. They were things not only to admire, but to build into the tools and the protections of life. He would fain have brought the whole forest home with him, but must needs be content to cut from it such timbers as he might bear home with him. This is the account he himself gives in the preface to his little book of selections from Augustine and Gregory, wherein he urges all others to imitate his example and curve the timbers of this forest into many a noble wain, or build them into many a lordly house wherein a man may take his ease, may fish and hunt, yet ever render the dues of peace and war to the heavenly Lord on whose loan land he has raised his home, till such time as, of His grace, he shall gain the freehold of eternal life.

It would seem that some of the striking passages thus read to him by his scholars, together with some of the Psalms and the offices of the Church, appealed so strongly to Alfred that he must needs have them constantly about his person, written out in the original tongue, and must learn to spell out their meaning and then to write it down in his own tongue. Thus in feeding and strengthening his own personal life and taking his solace at odd moments when the pressure of the affairs of State was removed, Alfred was unconsciously preparing for one of the greatest of his royal achievements.

Later on, certainly not earlier than 894, and probably, therefore, in the very thick of the second great contest with the Danes, Alfred conceived and began to execute a great scheme of providing his people with literature in their own tongue that they might share the delight and support he had himself drawn therefrom. He tells us how his eye had wandered over the ruined churches and libraries of his realm, how his thoughts had gone back with yearning to the time when England was a seat of learning sought by foreign scholars, instead of being, as it was when he came to the throne, so utterly devoid of culture that hardly a priest knew the English of his service book, or could translate a rescript from Latin. He wondered why those ancient scholars had not translated the goodly works they understood so well into English, and answered himself again that they had never thought that the land could be reduced to such a pitiable state as to make such a task needful. Then he thought how the Bible had been translated from Hebrew into Greek, and from Greek into Latin, and resolved to make it possible for the very peasantry of England to know something at least of the great books of the world. And so, "amid the manifold and mislike businesses of this realm," with the aid of his scholars he translated in the first instance Gregory's "Pastoral Care," "sometimes word for word, and sometimes sense for sense," into his native tongue. Alfred shows some of the rarest qualities of a translator, perfect command of all the resources of his own language and power of developing its latent possibilities to meet new requirements without violating its essential genius. His contemporary, Bishop Waerfirth, who translated Gregory's Dialogues at his command, gives a clumsy version deformed by Latin idioms that are foreign to the genius of English, so as to be often scarcely intelligible. Alfred, on the other hand, is determined at all hazards to write English and to write sense. If he can be sure that the sense is that of his author, so much the better; but he prefers writing sense that is frankly his own to transcribing nonsense which he is assured is his author's.

A careful study of his two great works, Gregory's "Pastoral Care" and the "Consolation" of Boethius, enable us to form a vivid and fascinating picture of his methods of work. We see him hurried from point to point of his threatened kingdom, now with this, now with that, scholar at his side, ever hoping for the time when he can go forward steadily and uninterruptedly with his loved work, ever thwarted by the more urgent claims that break in upon him, his love and energy enabling him to do in broken fragments of time more than another would have done in the protected leisure of the cloister, sometimes with the Latin text before him, poring over it and struggling with his imperfect knowledge of the language, or considering the notes and glosses he had made with the aid of his colleagues; sometimes sitting with them, listening to their expositions and hardly glancing at the Latin, but catching the fire or the humour of the passages they read from Gregory's pages, reissuing page after page, in his clear and vigorous English taken down on the spot by the scribe, and needing no revision; sometimes perplexed by the stuff which his interpreters declare Gregory has written, keenly and incisively cross-questioning them, holding them with a grasp out of which no literary or ecclesiastical eel could wriggle, and insisting on getting sense instead of only words, till at last he extorts a half-reluctant admission that some suggestion of his (which has the merit of being sense) may possibly be what the author meant. Freshness, sincerity, humility, honesty, and the trick of hand of a true craftsman who knows the nature of his material and the swing of his tools to a hair's breadth, are the characteristics of Alfred's workmanship as a translator.

When working alone he often misses his author's meaning. He is generally baffled by anything like sophistry. He can follow a purely abstract and intellectual argument with close and keen understanding, but his mind naturally dwells in and deals with the concrete; and abstract speculation has little interest for him. This comes out especially in his translation of Boethius, a work of which it is extremely difficult to give any adequate idea by mere description. It has sometimes been called a free translation, and sometimes a paraphrase; but it is really neither the one nor the other. Its relation to the Latin original cannot be represented by a single word. There are many passages in which Alfred identifies himself with Boethius and speaks straight out from his own personal experience as he converses with philosophy. Such are the splendid passages in which he asserts that the reproach of ambition and care for worldly things is misdirected when applied to him, for he has never sought power except as an instrument for performance of the task to which he has been called, and has desired no other fame than "to live worthily the whilst he lived," and then "to leave to those that should come after him the memory of good works." To this philosophy answers with a scathing denunciation of the self-deception of those who have in them the seeds of nobility, but who have not yet reached the higher plain of philosophy, nor learned the emptiness of all worldly fame. They have got as far as wishing to base their fame on deeds of virtue, not on selfishness, but still they value fame. Here the main stream of the discourse follows that of the original, but the sense of commanding personal inspiration and energy takes the Anglo-Saxon right away from the level of mere translation, and fills it with the passion of a personal confession. Elsewhere there is a subtle transformation and change of mental attitude which affects the whole tone and tissue of the work. Boethius writes as a Pagan with Aristotelean philosophy and Platonic religion, and from the Stoic's attitude towards the pleasures and emoluments of life. Alfred writes as a Christian. He is not interested in a philosophical demonstration that God is the summum bonum, for he has a short method of his own to prove it. "What do we know better, or even as good?" he asks. In his own strong words, "God is the roof and floor of all good," and this being to him a direct experience the logical demonstration of it (which, like other such, is more or less sophistical) does not impress him as important.

Everywhere, whatever he is translating, the King explains references and substitutes a straightforward narrative for learned allusions. If he says that a man ought to be content with what is necessary, he must add: "And if you would know what I mean by things needful I mean food and clothes, and those tools which a man requires for the craft for which he knows himself to be by nature fitted." And again, in what is sometimes known as the "royal chapter," he tells us what is the material and what are the tools that a king needs, and without which he cannot exercise his craft. "These are the king's materials and tools for ruling: to have his land well filled with men; to have men of prayer, and men of war, and men of work. . . . Land to cultivate, and offerings [for the clergy] and weapons and meat and ale and clothes, and whatso these three estates require." Or if Boethius writes, in allusive hints, of the story of Orpheus and Eurydice, King Alfred tells the story at length, and so tells it that his prose narrative breathes an aroma of tenderness and poetry such as rises from the story of Abraham and Isaac in the book of Genesis.

The severe metaphysics of the last book of Boethius, in which the Platonic doctrine of Eternity is developed, are passed aside by Alfred; but the sublimity of the religious conception is felt by him, for he had not studied Augustine for nothing.

As for us we know right little of what was before us, save by memory and by tradition; and yet less of what shall be after us. That only is assuredly present to us which at the moment is; but to Him all is present, both that which was before and that which now is and that which shall be after us; all is present to Him, nor doth His weal wax, nor again doth it ever wane; nor doth He ever remember aught, seeing that never did He forget aught; nor doth He ponder on aught, because He knoweth all; nor seeketh He aught, for nought hath He lost; neither doth He pursue any, because none may flee from Him; nor doth He dread any, because He hath none mightier, nay, nor equal. Ever doth He give, yet never doth He lack; ever is He almighty in that He ever willeth good and never evil.

In addition to translating religious and edifying works Alfred clearly had a large share in the translation of the Universal History of Orosius; indeed, the work is usually placed on the same level of authenticity as the "Pastoral Care" and the "Boethius." It is interesting as containing considerable passages of wholly original work, for Alfred knew much more of the geography and ethnography of Northern Europe than Orosius did, and the account of the travels of Other round the North Cape and into the White Sea still stands as a model of accurate and conscientious narrative.

The cumbrous and lifeless translation of Bede, usually (and on good and early, though not contemporary, authority, too) attributed to Alfred, cannot possibly be his; but in addition to the works we have already referred to, he is said to have begun a translation of the Psalms, and an extant version, breaking off at Psalm l., is supposed to be the work in question. Further, the last editor of his Code of Laws is impressed with the care given to the literary aspect of the work, and almost all students of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle feel, though none of them can prove, that the finest portions of the narrative are substantially the work of Alfred.

In conclusion we will revert to the little volume of selections from Augustine and Gregory with which we began. It illustrates the vividness with which any casual image translated itself into concrete facts to Alfred. Augustine merely says that wisdom may be approached "by many paths," which Alfred thus expands:—

I can show you another example, too, of wisdom. Think now what men visit the king's court when he bids them come to the town, whether it be to his moot or to his army. Do you think that they all come by the same road? I trow, though, that they come on very many ways. Some come from very far and have a very long way, and a very bad and a very hard one; and some a very long and a very straight and good one; and some a very short way, but bad and narrow and muddy; and some have a short road, smooth and straight; and yet they all come to one lord, some easily, some uneasily; neither do they come there with like ease, nor are they alike at ease when there. Some have more honour and ease than others, some less, and some full nigh without any, except this one thing, that they love. So it is also with wisdom. Everyone who loves it longs for it, they may come to it and may join its host and live with it. Though some are more to him and some less, as in every king's home, some are in the chamber, some in the hall, some on the barn floor, some in dungeons; and yet they all live to the glory of one lord.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

II.

Asser and King Aelfred.

A HUNDRED and fifty years later, when the monastic culture of Baeda and his follower Ealhwine had been swept away by the ravages of the Northmen, the contrast we have been studying between Welshman and Englishman is almost exactly repeated in the work of Asser and King Aelfred.

Asser was a monk of St. David's who, in 884, was invited to Aelfred's court to assist, with other scholars, in the re-establishment of learning in the desolated nation. In 893 he wrote the Gesta Aelfredi, which has come down to us in an imperfect and interpolated condition, but is still a priceless record of the inner life of our great king. We recognise at once the countryman of Gildas in his numerous similes and metaphores—some of them extravagant flourishes,—his intemperate language, and, if I may say so, literary gesticulation, his knowledge of Welsh, and his invariable usage of the word "Saxon" for "English." We would have preferred to see the greatest of English rulers through English eyes—in such cheerful, dispassionate, kindly pages, for instance, as Baeda's; but Asser, and not an Englishman, took the trouble to write his life, and it is obvious that he both enjoyed and was worthy of the king's affectionate confidence. His book is sadly too short. He tells us of Aelfred's beauty, of the grace of his bearing, speech, and manner "beyond that of all his brothers," of his delight in the chase, in hawking, metal and jewel work, architecture and mechanical inventions, of his incessant energy in duty or recreation (though he was an epileptic), and of his indomitable pluck in war. He had seen, he said, with his own eye, the stunted thorn-tree on White Horse Hill, round which the battle raged fierce and bloody on the glorious day of Ashdown. But the best portion of the Gesta are reminiscences of personal intercourse with Aelfred in the study of literature. We hear of the friendly welcome he received at the royal house at Dean, and of the king's pressing invitation that he should "enter his service and become his friend"; how he read and translated to him in his chamber at Leonaford, and wrote down for him in a "Handbook" his favourite passages; how Aelfred had scholars about him day and night, and carried books in his pockets, and loved above all the Old English poems, which he learnt by heart and recited, and would have his children and the children of the nobles learn and recite too in the palace school. It is a charming picture, and we wish we had more of it.

Aelfred as Chronicler.

King Aelfred's own claim as a chronicler rests on sure foundations. His preface to the "Herdman's Book," his versions of the histories of Orosius and Baeda, and his share, whatever it was, in the Winchester Chronicle, entitle him to be called the earliest historian in the English tongue.

The first contains his well-known account of the deplorable state of learning in England before he began his educational work. It is almost sternly practical. Even more than Baeda, Aelfred wrote with a purpose. He says:—

> It often came into my mind what wise men were once in England, both men of God and men of the world, and what blessed times were throughout England; how kings, who then ruled the folk, hearkened to God and His gospel, and kept peace within their borders, and spread their lands abroad, and had good speed both in war and wisdom; and how eager the clergy-hoods were to learn and teach and do their duties to God; and how men from afar sought this land for knowledge, and how we now, if we would have it, must go away to get it. So clean gone is it among the English that very few this side the Humber understand their services or can put into English a single passage of Latin; and I wean that not many beyond the Humber can. So few were they that I cannot think of one South of the Thames when I came to the throne.

Translator into English.

He wondered why wise men did not turn their learned books into their own speech. It must have been because they thought men would never be so reckless as to let their learning die. Then he minded how the Greeks wrote the Hebrew Law in their own language, and afterwards the Latins did the same. So he would English all the books which ought to be known. "And," he says, "by God's grace, if we have the stillness, all English youths who are free and have the means, shall be set to learn, while they have no other work to do, until they can read their mother tongue; and then those who will learn more shall go on to Latin."

In this spirit Aelfred translated, with some freedom, Gregory's Cura Pastoralis for the benefit of his clergy, and sent a copy richly bound to each bishop's see in his kingdom. Still more freely he made a version of the Historiarum Libri Septem of Orosius as a student's book of European history and geography, adding near the beginning a section on the Germanic nations and the voyages of Ohthere and Wulfstan. English history he supplied by a rendering of Baeda's Historia Ecclesiastica, which again was sometimes a paraphrase rather than a translation, but without such additions, though we might here the more expect them, as in the Orosius, Cura Pastoralis and Boethius. It is improbable that Aelfred would have refrained from inserting Wessex material into Baeda's Northumbrian record unless there already existed or he had in view the Winchester Chronicle.

The Winchester Chronicle.

That the Winchester Chronicle, which is almost certainly the oldest of the English Chronicles, existed, as an English work, before the time of Aelfred, has not been proved. Latin annals were kept in the Northumbrian monasteries after Baeda, and we may suppose that they were also kept in Wessex. We shall not be far wrong if we assume that the Winchester Chronicle was drawn up in the first instance from Latin annals, and continued in the national tongue, if not under Aelfred's influence, assuredly not long before his reign. Its opening is exceedingly meagre and broken, and was probably once much more so. By degrees it grows a little fuller and more continuous; and then, suddenly, at the year 851, when Aelfred was two years old, it developes into a respectable record. From 865 to 898, that is, from Aelfred's seventeenth year to his fiftieth, it is a consecutive narrative. Not a year is passed over, and to several is allotted sufficient space for some of the best writing we have in Old English. Let me attempt a literal rendering of the entry for the critical year 878:—

> In this year, in mid-winter, after twelfth-night, the heathen host stole away to Chippenham, and overran the land of the West Sexe, and sitting upon a mickle of the folk, drove them over sea; and the best part of the rest they rode down and forced under—but not the king Aelfred, who with a little band, uneasily, fared into the woods and the fastnesses of the moor. This same winter was Inwaer's brother, and Healfdene's, among the West Sexe, in Devonshire, with twenty-three ships; and him they slew there, and 840 men with him of his host. And at Easter Aelfred King, with his little band, made a fort at Athelney; and from this fort he won ground against the host, with that part of the Somersaetas who were nearest. Then in the seventh week after Easter he rode to Ecgbryht's stone by east Selwood. And to him there came all the Somersaetas and the Wiltsaetas, and that part of Hamptonshire which was this side of the sea; and fain they were to see him. And one night, from this wick, he fared to Iglea, and on the next to Ethandune; and there he fought with all the host, and put them to flight; and he rode after them to their fort, and sat down there a fortnight. And then the host gave him hostages, and mickle oaths, that they would off from his kingdom; and they eke gave their word that their king should have baptism; and this they fulfilled. And in about three weeks the king Godrum, with some thirty of the worthiest men in the host, came to him at Allor, which lis over against Athelney, and there the king received him at baptism, and his crism-loosing was at Wedmore. And he was twelve nights with the king; and he did him honour, and his feres, with mickle fee.

The writer is a little too unconscious of his readers, and has trouble with his relative clauses—his repeated "ands" are tiresome; but he gives us a concentrated essence of reliable information.

The Winchester Chronicle and its Successors.

After the year 924 the Winchester Chronicle begins to get thin, and very early in the next century, in the midst of Danish wars, it comes to an end. But copies of it were made the bases of independent annals at Canterbury, Worcester, and Abingdon. In the Canterbury chronicler we catch something of the wailing note of Gildas, as he tells of the unutterable weakness and vacillation of Aethelred Unredig (the "noble of rede" who was "redeless"), in whose disastrous reign (978-1016) whatever should have "gone forward went backward from time to time;

* The first of two lectures delivered in Manchester College, Oxford, Aug. 5 and 6, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students.

and ever the enemies' forces grew; and ever our men were withdrawn and then sent out again; and all came to nothing but vexing of our folk, spilling of fee, and boldness in the foe." On the other hand, the Worcester annalist writes with strong, religious feeling of the great year 1016, when, after a generation of national disgrace, English patriotism rose up, as out of the sleep of death, against the heathen oppressor. Few pages in our history are more glorious than his simple record of the seven months' superhuman energy of Eadmund of the Ironsides. But on Eadmund's death all the chronicles shrink immediately into dry lists of brief memoranda, and they remain so until the restoration of the house of Aelfred by the accession of Eadweard Confessor in 1042. At this point the Worcester, and a little later the Abingdon, annals are quickened by the national spirit; and the events preceding the Norman Conquest—the struggles between the English and Norman parties, Godwine's banishment and return, the fall of the Norman favourites, Harold's rise and election to the throne and his victory at Stamford Bridge—are related at length in graphic and glowing terms. But here suddenly there is a great change. The Abingdon chronicle breaks off just before the battle of Senlac, and is not taken up again. The annalist at Canterbury records it in one brief sentence, and, after another entry, writes no more. The Worcester chronicle, which is almost as silent about Harold's defeat, is continued under the influence of the single English bishop left by William, Bishop Wulfstan, through the two first Norman reigns; but it ends in 1107. One of its later entries is the famous description of the Conqueror, which I must not stop to quote much as I am tempted to. In Peterborough alone, the old English stronghold among the fens, and the scene of exploits by Hereward, did the English annals maintain their existence; but here, at last, they were concluded in the terrible time of the wars of Stephen.

(To be concluded.)

RECENT "ALFRED" BOOKS.*

FOR more than three years we have been looking forward to the national commemoration of Alfred the Great, to be held next week at Winchester, on the occasion of the thousandth anniversary of his death. October 28, 901, is the commonly received date of the king's death, and while recent historical investigations point rather to 899 or 900 as the actual year, scholars are not yet agreed, and for the practical purpose of this commemoration there was not sufficient reason for choosing either of the other years.

On March 18, 1898, at a meeting held at the Mansion House, it was decided, on the motion of the late Bishop of London, seconded by the Right Hon. James Bryce, M.P., to hold a national commemoration, and a large and representative committee was appointed, under the patronage of the Queen, to take all necessary steps. The colossal statue of Alfred, by Mr. Hamo Thorneycroft, R.A., erected at Winchester, will remain the chief visible embodiment of this commemoration, but it has naturally led also to renewed study of the king's life and writings, and to the publication of a number of books.

Among the first fruits of the labours of the Commemoration Committee was a very interesting volume (1), edited by Mr. Alfred Bowker, the hon. secretary, who was Mayor of Winchester when the proposal first began to take shape. The volume contains a number of essays by different writers dealing with special aspects of King Alfred's life and work. Mr. Frederic Harrison writes on "Alfred as King" (an essay from which we have quoted some eloquent passages in our leading article), the Bishop of Bristol on "Alfred as a Religious Man and an Educationalist," Professor Earle on "Alfred as a Writer," and other essays deal with war, geography, arts, and law. The Introduction is by the late Sir Walter Besant, who also wrote a little book for popular use, telling "The Story of King Alfred" (3). Both book and essay have at their conclusion the following plea for Winchester as the natural site for a memorial:—

It seems unnecessary to urge that a monument to Alfred must be set up in Winchester and not in London or in Westminster, or anywhere else. In Winchester lies the dust of his ancestors, and of the kings his successors. Thirty-five of his line made Winchester their capital; twenty were buried in the Cathedral. In this city Alfred received instruction from St. Swithin; the city was already old and venerable when Alfred was a boy. He was buried first in the Cathedral, and afterwards in the Abbey, which he himself founded, hard by. The name of Alfred's country, well-nigh forgotten except by scholars, has been revived of late years by a Wessex man, Thomas Hardy. But the name of Alfred's capital continues in the venerable and historic city of Winchester, which yields to none in England for the monuments and the memories of the past.

Mr. Draper's book (2) is also popular in its aim, but of a more scholarly quality, and the Bishop of Hereford, as an old schoolmaster, commends it to teachers, and also to parents. After sketching the life and reign of Alfred, the book has a number of interesting studies, including one on Asser's Life of Alfred, one on the White Horse of Ashdown, and another on Alfred's Burial-Place. The book is well illustrated.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's Lecture (4), delivered in the spring at Harvard College, gives a delightful account of the King's writings, quoting a number of passages, and, by contrast with other writers, showing the noble simplicity of Alfred's Saxon.

It may also be noted here that Mr. Stopford Brooke devotes a chapter of thirty pages to Alfred in his "English Literature from the Beginning to the Norman Conquest," published by Macmillan in 1898.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS UNION.

THE Guilds' Union, having published the little manual of Services and Prayers for Guild meetings, to which we recently called attention, has now issued a first leaflet, containing a statement of the ideal aimed at in the Guild, as a constituent element in the life of our churches. The officers and Council of the Union are as follows, and we commend their statement, which we print here in full, to the earnest attention of the Churches:—

President: Rev. Joseph Wood, Birmingham.
Vice-President: Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., Leeds.
Treasurer: Mr. H. P. Greg, Oak Brow, Handforth, Manchester.
Secretary: Rev. John Ellis, Sheffield.

Council:

Rev. W. H. Drummond, B.A., Belfast.
Rev. E. D. P. Evans, Kidderminster.
Rev. H. Gow, B.A., Leicester.
Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Wandsworth.
Rev. J. J. Wright, Chowbent.
Rev. Henry Shaen Solly, M.A., Bridport.
Miss Gittins, Leicester.
Miss Florence Hill, Hampstead.
Mr. Ion Pritchard, Essex Hall.
Mr. F. Talbot, Highgate.
Mr. C. Wood, Birmingham.

THE GUILD IDEA.

One object of the Guild is to provide a link between the Sunday School and the Church, between the religious susceptibilities of early life and the critical time when the attractions and excitements of the worldly life press in upon the young soul with almost magical power. Another, and equally important, object of the Guild is to unite the numerous volunteers in Church and Sunday School work into a league of fellowship. In its complete development the Guild will be a federation of the various classes, societies, clubs, and institutions that exist especially for helping the young life as it embarks on its great interests. The Guild seeks primarily to retain amid an appropriate religious environment those who have grown up and are approaching manhood or womanhood in our homes and schools. It steps in at a time when the young are feeling the spell of influences many of which would draw them away from the best things, and by providing counter-attractions under the auspices of the Church, would make Worship a joy, and not a servitude; Responsibility an inspiration, not a burden; and Service for others a daily sweetness. Much of the religious life of the young perishes for lack of three things—(1) systematic instruction; (2) self-expression; (3) hearty and gracious encouragement. The Guild aims at imparting religious knowledge, at encouraging the young to take part in the conduct of religious services, and at nourishing the strength, buoyancy, and enthusiasm which arise from a sense of companionship in great interests.

A Guild, or something corresponding to a Guild in idea and work, is as necessary a part of Church activity as a Sunday School. The Debating Class, Reading Circle, Cricket, Football, and Cycle Clubs, Recreation Evenings, and the Social Gatherings of the Young, as well as their Bible Classes and more directly religious work, should also be branches of the Guild. It is one great aim of the Guild to banish from the minds of the young the mischievous division between secular and sacred. It therefore combines in itself, and by its own agencies, scope for athletics, for dramatic and musical faculty, for social enjoyment, no less than for kindly service, earnest truth-seeking, and reverent worship. The Guild would organise the young life of our parishes, churches, and schools, not in any Pharisaical or pietistic temper, but in the broad, sane, and human spirit of Jesus. It would include every social pursuit proper to youth. It would bring together the young of all classes of society in a fellowship where class distinctions should be forgotten. It would stimulate mental growth, helping its members to form and express their thoughts. The Guild would be the servant of the Church by providing workers for its institutions, and by making the Church a centre of fascinating interest for its rising sons and daughters.

In forming a Guild, the first thing is to bring together the Sunday-school teachers and the various workers in the Church to form the nucleus of the new organisation. Without the emphatic encouragement of their teachers and elders, the young will be very reluctant to make the stand for religion which the Guild idea requires. But from the first the young would be expected to take an active part in the conduct both of business and meetings. It is fatal to a Guild that everything should be done for it by the elders. The Guild is to develop the capacity of self-government, and to call forth hidden powers by imposing grave responsibilities. The meetings for worship, whether weekly or monthly, should be the pulse of the whole machine. Here also various members may, under suitable conditions, take part. The work of the Guild, as distinct from its social and recreative side, should be so arranged as to call forth the many-sided energies of the young, giving to each member some special duty.

Most of the great Churches of Christendom have found it necessary to pay far greater attention to their young people in modern times than in ancient days. And the Churches have greatly increased their strength and vitality by the creation of Guilds. It remains for us to follow so striking an example; but, of course, in our own fashion—working out a form of the Guild idea which shall be sympathetic with the genius, history, and position of our Free Churches.

Further information with respect to the formation and conduct of Guilds may be obtained on application to the REV. JOHN ELLIS, BROOMHILL, SHEFFIELD, who will also, when desired, arrange for a deputation to attend a preliminary meeting.

HUNGARIAN TRAVEL NOTES.—II.

DURING the Sunday afternoon which we spent in Budapest (Sept. 1), we were present at the foundation of the Francis David Society, and we were made honorary members of the society. Our friends of the Budapest Church subsequently entertained us with light refreshments and an abundance of the most delicious fruits in the minister's rooms. On the following day we went on to Arad. In the course of our journey we were met at the station by a deputation from Gyöma, who gave us the most kindly welcome; but on reaching Arad it appeared as if a large part of the population must have been there to greet us. The Carpathian Club were there in great force, and we were most enthusiastically received. In this town a beautiful monument has been erected in memory of the cruel death which thirteen Hungarian generals had suffered. There is also a very interesting museum full of things of great historic value concerning Arad and the revolution of 1848.

We continued our journey to Deve, in the castle of which Francis David died, and on the Tuesday morning took train to Hunyad, and then to the ironstone mines of Gyalar, which were reached by means of a steep rope incline. These mines were worked in Roman times, and the ore is carried, some by railway, and some by an overhead wire line, to the furnaces at Hunyad, which we afterwards visited. In this place we also went through the picturesque castle of John Hunyad. Early on Wednesday morning we took the train for Torda, which is a most interesting town. It was here that the Diet in 1557 declared that the people should have freedom of conscience in matters of religion, and in 1566 the Unitarian faith was made lawful. We visited the house where the Diet used to be held, and the Unitarian Church; and also saw a very interesting picture by a modern artist, representing Francis David declaring before the Diet that conscience was the gift of God, and that a man's faith concerned himself alone. We afterwards visited the famous Torda gorge. It is a good illustration of the action of running water on limestone rocks.

On the following day (Thursday, Sept. 5) we drove to Toroczo, and we shall never forget the incidents of the day. The weather was all that could be desired, and the route, for the greater part of the distance, lay through a most beautiful hilly country, abounding with wood, and by the side of a charming river. We had not long left Torda when we were met by a deputation from a neighbouring Unitarian Church welcoming us to their country, and shortly afterwards we saw in the distance a variegated group with a flag flying over their heads. This proved to be a gathering from another neighbouring Unitarian Church. The women and girls looked very beautiful in their attractive dresses, and presented the lady members of our party with flowers. When we reached Borev, where the road for Toroczo branches off and the river is crossed by a wooden bridge, we were met by a deputation from that place, although some five miles away from it. Our friends had constructed an arch of branches of trees and flowers, and the whole was surmounted by a flag. On the bridge were five mounted men in unique costumes, who headed our procession, and as we approached Toroczo guns were fired from time to time, somewhat startling some of our horses. On reaching the village we found the roadway strewed with branches of trees and flowers, and we passed under another triumphal arch. An excellent brass band was in attendance, and a great crowd of people in their picturesque holiday attire. After formal addresses of welcome and their acknowledgment, and the presentation of flowers to all the lady members of our party, we went forward with the band at our head to the village school, where we were provided with some refreshments. We then attended service in the church, after which an excellent dinner was served. The remainder of the day was spent in various ways about the village. We were favoured by the kindliest of welcomes from this most interesting people. We saw some of their houses; we saw them dance; and some photographers of our party took a good number of groups. So full of unusual incident was the day's proceedings that it is impossible in a short paper to give more than a very brief account of what really took place. Though it was a long day's excursion, we went on the same night to Kolozsvar. On Friday and Saturday we spent our time amongst the numerous public places of this famous town, on the Friday afternoon having tea with the good Bishop Ferencz and his wife, who received us at their house with delightful simplicity and graciousness.

W.

Since receiving the above notes we have welcomed our friend and correspondent home, the first of the travellers to return. We hope next week to publish the rest of his story, telling of Sunday at Kolozsvar, when services both in Hungarian and English were held, and of further doings of the party. The new college buildings, for the opening of which the visit was originally planned, were unfortunately not ready for the formal ceremony, but were inspected by our friends. According to the programme of the tour the party was due to be home on Friday evening, but some members have had to hasten their steps, and others have taken the opportunity of further travel or of rest by the way, after the hard work of their delightful time in Hungary.

HUNGARIAN FUNCTIONS.—II.

Kolozsvar, Sept. 7, 1901.

FROM Budapest to Kolozsvar the tourists were entertained at a series of banquets by the Transylvanian Carpathian Society, and, at various points, by the Unitarian communities. After the reception on the station at Budapest, the party were driven to the Hotel Erzherzog Stephan. Dinner was served immediately, many of the local friends being present. Mr. Liptay Pál, a member of the Unitarian congregation, submitted the first toast. The Hungarians, he said, were a little nation, struggling, and working, and fighting for independence, and they were proud of their country. The English nation had done the Hungarians service which they would never forget. Therefore they were glad that their guests had come to his native country. When he read "Robinson Crusoe," as a lad, he wanted to go out into the world; but, for the Hungarian, that was a difficult thing. He had no opportunities like the Englishman, who visited Australia as easily as the Hungarian crossed the Danube! Once an Englishman stayed with his father at Budapest on his way to Constantinople, and he described Buda as a point where civilisation ceased. But when he came back from the Holy Land, two or three months later, he confessed that civilisation began at Budapest! That was twenty-five years ago; but he thought, if they looked round now, it would be found that the city had all the necessary things of civilisation. In the name of the Carpathian Society he was charged to greet their guests, and he did it with all his heart. He never had a greater joy than when Mr. Fretwell wrote to say that a great company was coming over. In Transylvania they would find a heartier reception even than Budapest could give them, but it could not be more sincere. Cheers were then given for the English guests, and Miss Tagart, in responding, spoke of the toils of the journey and the compensations afforded by so hearty a reception. Rev. E. C. Jones, of Bradford, added some further words, and referred to the memory of Kossuth, and to the Unitarian cause in Hungary. In England they said that blood was thicker than water, but he thought that spiritual sympathy was the strongest bond of all. Mr. Blessley, of Portsmouth, said a few words, and the proceedings closed with the singing of the British and Hungarian National Anthems.

On Friday at the Bokor Restaurant in Varos Liget, Mr. Sekay, president of the congregation, welcomed the visitors on behalf of the church and of their younger brother, the Carpathian Society. In the course of life little kindnesses helped to make men friendly towards each other; and great misfortunes such as their country had endured went to prove friendship. They remembered how in times past the deepest sympathy had existed between England and Hungary; and as hosts they would do their best to show their appreciation for words and kindnesses which had shown England to be in close sympathy with what the Hungarians felt to be their truest being. Times may come and times may change to alter the conditions of life, but, he continued, you may feel sure that you will always find friends across the Carpathians, close to the Danube, and under the shadows of the high mountains; you will always be welcomed here with an earnest, ardent sincerity.

Miss Tagart, in reply, said it was already wonderful how in a short time they had been shown so many interesting sights. She specially thanked the congregation for meeting the party in this friendly way and spirit. It would be a difficult thing to do as they had been done by, but English Unitarians would try to show something of the same kindness and hospitality if a number of their friends would only come to England.

Miss Ellen Györy, who decided to accompany the party to Kolozsvar, and who is a well-known writer, then spoke with much fervour of her native land. The past and the present are united, for the present is built on the foundation of the past, was her theme. Oriental people, they say, are fond of explaining things by the means of tales. Allow me, the daughter of an Oriental people, the descendant of Oriental heathen Hungarians, to remind you of a well-known tale, of the lion that was wounded and bleeding to death. When the other animals, the mean and the base, came near and were no longer afraid of the dying lion in his last agony, there was one who did honour to the lion—and it was the noble charger of the battle-fields. But in history the tale is reversed. There was a time when Hungary, the noble charger, was bleeding, wounded to death. And there were coming the mean and the base, and were not afraid of offending him. But there was one who did honour to the dying charger in his last moments, and it was the lion, the British lion. When we appealed in vain for mercy to our nearest neighbour, then it was England who did us honour, teaching us as in the words of her greatest poet, whose words were as holy scripture to us, "that the quality of mercy is not strained." But now, thank God, the times are already over when we wanted mercy. What we want the most now is justice; and in this respect I think England was always the leader of the whole of Europe in the science of right and law. And it is to England that we should best appeal in our struggle for justice. It is difficult for England and for Western Europe to see our struggles in the right light because of the reports that are circulated by our nearest neighbour. But I think the reason that England has seen and understood our struggle the best, is that he who stands the highest sees the farthest. And the thing we desire is that England may be faithful to her old self, that she will understand us still; and then we may be thankful that England who has understood our past will understand our present, which will be our best encouragement for our future. The address which was spoken in English was received with loud applause.

Mr. Liptay next referred to a visit he made to Chicago in the year of the great fire, and after reading a letter which he subsequently received from the Rev. Robert Collyer, asked the company to drink to the health of the venerable old man. This was done amid enthusiasm, and a telegram of greeting was forwarded to him.

The Rev. T. P. Spedding (Rochdale) subsequently gave "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over." Mrs. Korchmaros, in the name of the Hungarian ladies, spoke feelingly of Miss Tagart, in terms that appealed to the whole company, and expressed her affection also for the Misses Sharp. The proceedings, which had been of an animated character throughout, shortly afterwards terminated.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Appeal.

Billingshurst.—The Rev. G. Lansdown writes to say that in response to his appeal of last week for Wisboro' Mission Church, he has received 5s. and the promise of a volume of the Seedsower, which, while welcome, will by no means satisfy the needs of his village community. We beg friendly readers to refer again to Mr. Lansdown's letter in last week's INQUIRER.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services.

At Chichester harvest services were held last Sunday, the evening sermon being preached by Councillor Morris Bew. At Leigh, Lancs., three services were conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, the collections amounting to over £10, the largest amount yet received at Leigh on such an occasion. At Stannington the sermons were preached by the Rev. J. E. Jenkins, assistant minister of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and on Monday evening the Service of Song, "Her Benny," was rendered by the choir, the chapel being quite filled.

Boston.—On Sunday week the Rev. W. Stoddart took for the subject of his evening sermon "Tolstoy and his Teachings," and gave an interesting account of the great Russian's life-experience and its result in the teachings of his later years. The quality of Tolstoy's Christianity was clearly described, and contrasted with that of the Church which had excommunicated him. "May Tolstoy live," so the sermon concluded, "in spite of the Church's curse, to teach men a higher faith, sweeter manners, better laws, a nobler mode of life." The Boston Post of Sept. 7 prints the sermon in full.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—The Rev. A. N. Blatchford last Sunday celebrated the thirty-fifth anniversary of his ordination and of his ministry at Lewin's Mead, and after morning service a meeting was held in the Lecture Hall, at which Mr. and Mrs. Blatchford were welcomed home from their holiday, and the occasion was taken by the young men of the congregation to present to their minister a pulpit copy of the Revised Version of the Bible, as "an expression of their respect and esteem." The chair was taken by Mr. F. E. Gillard, treasurer of the church, and the presentation, on behalf of the young men, was made by Mr. Bunce. Mr. Herbert Thomas and Mr. Arthur Lee also joined in the warm expressions of regard for their minister. Mr. Blatchford, in acknowledging the gift, said that day was indeed a notable milestone in his life. The retrospect that it represented to them was not altogether one of joy, for he could assure them there were sacred memories which could never die. Old faces appeared to him out of the past while he shook hands and exchanged greetings with the tried friends who were supporting and strengthening him at the present time. And if that were the last testimony he should deliver to them he would say that if any small measure of acceptance had been granted to him he remembered gratefully and respectfully the example, the teaching, the fatherly love and care of his beloved old predecessor, the Rev. William James. He had been told that utterances of his were characterised by a spirit free from poor sectarian influences. If that were so, it was Mr. James who first taught him how to express his own views. He could not refrain from saying how deeply he appreciated the form their kindness had taken. In a way that volume was indeed a generous and personal testimony, most dear to his heart, but the virtue of it to him lay in the fact that in recognising any work of his they had linked him and his services with the Lewin's Mead pulpit, and with the exposition of those principles and doctrines which were dear to him as they were to their fathers and forefathers. It was no mean privilege to be associated with a ministry in the lines of which stood so many earnest and faithful men, out of whose bright company stood pre-eminently Estlin, Armstrong, James, and, greatest of all, Dr. Lant Carpenter. Here he would take the opportunity of saying to them, as a minister of religion, that if any measure of success had been vouchsafed to him it had come only at the time when he had tried earnestly to think of others first and himself last. In conclusion, he testified to the kindly spirit shown to him personally by every minister of religion, of whatsoever denomination, with whom he had been brought into contact in the city. Differences there might be, but he would never make these differences an excuse for unfriendliness towards others who were doing the work of the minister.

London: Wandsworth.—Last Sunday the Rev. W. G. Tarrant exchanged pulpits with the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, minister of the Hindhead Congregational Church. Mr. Stallworthy, in his morning sermon, having read Mark vii. as the second lesson, spoke of the healing of the deaf mute, picturing first all the wealth we enjoy in the infinite variety of the sounds in Nature, and the different powers of expression, not by articulate speech alone, using incidentally as a parable Wordsworth's description of the dalesman, whose deafness could not rob him of many of the best gifts of life, and in the latter part of the sermon touching upon the question of the miracles of healing, in which he thought there was clearly a substratum of historical truth. The power of transcendent mind over bodily conditions, and the part played by faith in helping towards recovery, were elements of experience not to be ignored, but Mr. Stallworthy did not fail to note the unwillingness of Jesus to lay much stress on this power which he exercised, the importance of which the people would so easily exaggerate, at the expense of his more vital spiritual teaching.

THE interesting paper by the Rev. Tony André, of Florence, on "The Liberal Movement in Italy," which, even with omissions, we have been obliged to divide into three parts, and which will be concluded in our issue of next week, will appear in full, as we have already stated, in the volume of the Proceedings of the International Council; and it may also be had separately as a pamphlet from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. Price, 3d.). With Mr. André's paper we shall have completed our publication of the International Council Papers, and we understand that the volume of the Proceedings will be ready before the end of the month.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE hope of last week that President McKinley's life might be spared was proved only too soon to be illusive. The assassin's bullet had done its fatal work, and it was found afterwards that there had never been any chance of recovery. On Saturday we heard that after affecting leave-takings on the Friday, borne with a quiet courage and in the spirit of a truly religious man, the President towards evening became unconscious, and soon after two o'clock on Saturday morning quite peacefully passed away. The grief of the American people is shared by their kindred on this side of the ocean not less sincerely than they made our grief their own when at the beginning of the year our Queen was taken from us. On Thursday, the day of the President's funeral at Canton, memorial services were held in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's, in the City Temple, on behalf of Evangelical Nonconformists, and elsewhere. Vice-President Roosevelt who has now taken the chief place, is said to be an extremely capable, public-spirited and patriotic man, well qualified to serve his people with great distinction. As McKinley was an earnest member of the Methodist Church, so is the new President, of the Dutch Reformed Church.

THE commemoration of the thousandth anniversary of the death of King Alfred is proceeding at Winchester as we write these notes. In consequence of the death of President McKinley Lord Northbrook's garden party is postponed from Thursday, the day of the funeral, to Saturday, and a social function at Winchester College, fixed for Thursday, was abandoned; but it was rightly felt that there was nothing in the commemoration of the great King out of keeping with the deepest sympathy with the mourning of the American people. The card of invitation to the National Commemoration, issued by the Mayor of Winchester, is in itself an interesting memorial of the occasion. On the front of the folded card is a scroll resting on Alfred's three chief books, and declaring the purpose of the commemoration, while below is a quotation from Freeman: "He was the spiritual and intellectual leader of his people." Within the folds of the card are three illustrated sections, showing in the centre the statue of the King, by Hamo Thorneycroft, and on either side the arms of Alfred and of Winchester, printed in colours, and an ancient and a modern ship. Beneath the King's arms his famous saying is printed in Saxon and in modern English :—

I have sought to live worthily, the while I have lived, that I might leave to those coming after me my memory in good works.

THE proceedings at Winchester began on Wednesday with the inspection of the chief ancient buildings of the city and addresses of archæological and historical interest, while in the afternoon Sir Henry Irving gave a reading of "Becket," and in the evening Mr. Frederic Harrison lectured in the Guildhall on "King Alfred the Great." The King, he said, was the purest, noblest and most venerable hero of whom our race could boast. No other character in history remained completely heroic, majestic and perfect in public and private life. Criticism had only made him a more impressive figure. The true Alfred was grander even than the poetic Alfred. He rescued England from barbarism and heathendom, and left his country one of the best organised communities in western Europe. He created a Kingdom not by guile or fraud, but by wisdom. The commemoration was to continue to the end of the week, Friday being the chief day, with a procession, the unveiling of the statue, and also a special service in the cathedral.

THE Methodist Œcumenical Conference brought its meetings to a close on Tuesday. The next meeting, in 1911, is to be held somewhere within the limits of the western section, that is across the Atlantic. The bicentenary of John Wesley's birth, which falls in 1903, a cablegram from the President of the World's Fair Directory suggested should be celebrated by universal Methodism at St. Louis, but it was agreed that the various sections of the Methodist Church should decide for themselves how to hold that commemoration. On receipt of the news of the death of President McKinley a devotional service was held last Saturday and a resolution passed, and on Tuesday the Conference closed with a special memorial service.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE is bringing out this week a little book on King Alfred, and later on in the autumn his much-looked for volume on Browning will appear. Mr. Brooke is to deliver in November, at University College, under the Stopford Brooke Lectureship Fund, a course of lectures on "Matthew Arnold" and some other poets. After Christmas he will deliver a second course upon "Rossetti and William Morris."

MR. HERBERT RIX is well known as a preacher in many of our churches, and as a most interesting lecturer. In company with the Rev. W. J. Jupp, he went in the spring of this year to Palestine, and travelled through the land, not hastily, but following a well-considered route, as far north as the springs of Jordan. We had the pleasure, at the time, of publishing a letter of Mr. Jupp's from Nazareth, and more recently a sermon inspired by that northern scene under the shadow of Hermon; and now we are glad to learn that Mr. Rix is offering two popular lectures for the coming season, one a personal narrative, "To Palestine and Back," illustrated by sixty lantern slides taken by the lecturer himself, and the other on "The People of Palestine" similarly illustrated. Congregational and other societies arranging programmes for the winter would, we feel sure, be well advised to secure one or both of these lectures, and Mr. Rix hopes to have others ready in the course of the season. A syllabus of the two lectures, and of another on Wordsworth and the River Duddon, may be had from Mr. Herbert Rix, B.A., Limpsfield, Surrey.

WE called attention a fortnight ago to the forthcoming autumnal meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to be held at Leeds on Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 21 and 22. On the back page of our present issue a more complete announcement will be found advertised, giving a full list of those who are to take part in the meetings, and the chief of the subjects to be dealt with.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums :—Mr. and Mrs. Cogan Conway, £1 1s.; Mr. Thornely, £2; Mr. Harrison, £1 1s.; Miss M. D. Shannon, 5s.; Mrs. Carson, £1 1s.; A Friend, £10; Anon., 5s.; Mrs. Jevons, £1 10s.; Mrs. Bayle Bernard (2nd donation), £1.

FREE WILL AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

SIR,—In reply to Mr. Upton I would say, Yes, as a "consistent Determinist." I frankly accept most of the consequences which seem to him so impossible, and I think that the gradual acceptance of them by thinkers which is now taking place is conducing both to individual reformation and to social progress. The improved tone in our treatment of criminals, the endeavour to make punishment reformatory rather than expiatory, is one evidence of this. I do not accept Coleridge's assertion that Regret is widely different from Remorse, and I think that indignation generally has an element of anger in it which is ignoble. The Free Will scheme, with its Rewards and Punishments, its low ideal of the Great God, and its exaggeration of Man's place in the universe can never, I think, be made to harmonise with modern knowledge. F. T. MOTT.

Birstal-hill, Leicester, Sept. 12.

SIR,—In Professor Upton's letter in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 7, he expresses his belief that "the time has come when we should take earnest counsel with each other" on this subject, and in response to that invitation I should like to call attention to some questions that arise after the Libertarians have triumphantly broken the first line of the Determinist position, for the controversy has various stages.

The first Determinist line is that the strongest motive rules our conduct, and we have no choice in the matter; that our will is not a power deciding among them, but only a self-registering balance. That position, which would deprive the words freedom, choice, moral responsibility of all real meaning, is broken and indeed shattered by unambiguous experience. For not only are we aware of choice and of force exerted, sometimes successfully and sometimes unsuccessfully, against the most driving or most attractive impulse; but we also know the passive state of allowing the motives to determine our action among themselves, without our interference. Those two conditions, active and passive, are so entirely different that it seems as if only the exigencies of Determinist theory could confuse them, or deny the exertion of a real force of will, the only actual force which we directly know.

We have also the experience of resisting a powerful impulse, such as anger, and then at last, under prolonged or intense strain, letting it have its way, with a sense of relief the very opposite of the previous strenuous endeavour. But at the same time we are ashamed of ourselves or blame ourselves, and feel ourselves morally responsible for not continuing the struggle. We may excuse ourselves by saying that we had tried our utmost. Yet we are aware that we still had, at least, some small reserve of will power which we had not put forth; that we could and therefore ought to have exerted it, and that we could have acted differently if we had tried harder. And with all due respect to Dr. Mellone and to Spinoza I see no reason to suppose that a falling stone, endowed with consciousness of its fall, could possibly have any similar inward experience.

But, when that first Determinist line is carried, the question presents itself, How is it that I tried or did not try? that I resisted or yielded? that I continued my resistance or desisted under the strain?

To the question, What decided my action against the driving power of passion? we can answer, that it was the exertion of my will; the putting forth of the power of my personal self. But we cannot give a similar answer to the question, What decided me to exert my power or to desist?

We may decline to answer that question and simply say that I chose to act or not to act. Or we may say (if we yielded to the pressure) that it showed weakness of will, or want of courage to endure, or of resolve to do the right. The plain moral verdict of unphilosophical humanity gives some support to that answer.

We feel that a wrong or weak act shows that there was something wrong or weak in us. We are ashamed of ourselves, or, conversely, we may have a certain pride in ourselves; as one of George Eliot's characters says, "I didn't know I should have rung so true." And this feeling of shame or pride in ourselves is different from that of blame or moral approbation of the act.

We do not really blame ourselves because we fall short of the very highest spiritual attainments of the great saints and heroes of humanity; but we are humbled by our knowledge of our inferiority to them in holiness and strength.

This may be called the second stage of Determinism: saying that it was the effort of our personal self which decided the conflict of motive impulses, but that the action of our personal self was determined by the measure of our strength and the make of our spiritual being. It leaves a certain real meaning to moral responsibility, choice, and effort. But it might still be said that, being what we were, we could not act otherwise than as we did.

And, moreover, it does not exactly answer the question, how it was that, when we had still unexhausted power of resisting anger, we did not choose to exert it. It is not that our will-power was totally exhausted. That is not the case we are considering. But why, having the power of acting, did we yield to the assailing impulse? Of course it was our free choice, for which we blame or approve ourselves; in the plain, practical meaning of free choice, behind which for practical moral purposes we do not usually require to go.

But, after all, why did we choose to act in the one way rather than the other? Why did we resist or yield? If there was nothing in the inmost make of our being to account for our self-determination, it has very much the appearance of chance. And, if it was something in the make of our being, it looks very much like an inward necessity. It is another form of the question, what is our personal self? Is it a definite existence which can only act according to what it is? Or is it only an indefinite potentiality of acting in any direction? Or, on the other hand, is there any third possibility, realised in our free personality, which human language, growing out of phenomenal experiences, is inadequate to express? And, in that last case, what help can be given to thoughts beyond the scope of language, the "Lieder ohne Worte" of the soul?

I might do something towards answering those questions that arise after the first line of Determinism is broken. But I want help myself; and, therefore, prefer to ask Professor Upton for his assistance in the solution of the difficulty. The questions themselves may be some contribution towards "the earnest counsel with each other" to which he invites us.

C. D. BADLAND.

AMONG many worthy utterances last Sunday in reference to the tragedy of President McKinley's death, we deeply regret to find one from one of our own pulpits, which, as reported in a local paper, we have read with astonishment and shame. Preaching at Devonport on Sunday, Mr. E. B. Russell, of Torquay, a temporary occupant of the pulpit, is reported to have spoken of Anarchists in terms which we should have thought were forbidden to a Christian. In the midst of the progress of the age, there were, he said, "a class of human fiends in the world whose one aim was destruction."

They were a class whose existence demanded utter extermination, and the most dreadful pains and penalties that human ingenuity could devise for their suppression. In fact, if there was to be a revival of the old modes of torture at the stake, in the exasperation of public feeling, it would not be surprising. Deprivation of all social and political rights in every country should be accorded them. Their assemblies should on no pretence be permitted, and every act of theirs should be punishable with the severest penalties—even of death. They could but hope that the Governments of the earth would adopt such measures of extreme severity as not only to terrify those abominable wretches, but to utterly move them off the face of the earth. Nothing but wholesale extermination could reach the class, and neither mercy nor pity should be shown them any more than to a deadly serpent or an infuriated wild beast.

We are ashamed even to repeat such words, but since they appear to have been uttered from one of our pulpits, we feel bound to repudiate them in the strongest terms.

PROFESSOR FANCHIOTTI, who writes from Anerley with cordial approval of the Rev. Tony André's paper on "The Liberal Movement in Italy," asks us to point out that the Mgr. Bonomelli mentioned last week in the section of the paper "Towards Moral and Social Reform" (p. 582) is Bishop of Cremona, not of Milan.

ERRATUM.—In the Rev. H. D. Roberts' letter last week, "The Boer has been in Natal" read "was then."

SIMPLE as it sounds, the doing one's best at each moment is all there is of life. To do the best for one day, on each occasion that presents itself, makes it the more possible for the next day.—Lilian Whiting.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

BY THE REV. TONY ANDRÉ, OF FLORENCE.*

III.

Catholic Laity.

AMONG the laity we meet with the same currents that we have observed in the ecclesiastical world.

We cannot devote much time to those Catholic writers who are mainly concerned with political and patriotic questions. They are numerous and very able; but they hardly come within the scope of the present paper.

. . . . . .

The Catholic Italians who desire to see more religious vitality are equally numerous. Speaking generally, they turn their attention either to the social questions which now occupy all minds, or to questions of a purely moral order.

The Deputy Pompeo Molmenti has been in the Chamber for more than ten years, and while there has always maintained that the religious sentiment is indispensable for the education of the rising generations. The ethics of the Gospel being the purest in existence, he would wish to see it triumph in Italy, "for," says he, "the Christian idea in the schools is a guarantee of morality and the source of Liberal convictions in the true sense of the word. On the one hand religious instruction should be compulsory for all children, except for those whose parents object to it; on the other hand, it should be entirely impartial, independent of any kind of denominational creed—above all, separate from the Vatican. If the antagonism between religion and patriotism were to last much longer, it might result in a schism being thought of." In fact, the idea of a schism ferments in many minds, and this challenge, thrown out before the whole Parliament to the clerical Intransigeants, depicts the present situation better than anything else.

In 1898 the Deputy Bianchi, a Neapolitan professor, had spoken nearly to the same effect in the Chamber. Though the Italian school instructs the children, said he, it does not educate them. Where is the remedy to be found? It would be a mistake to go back simply to the dogmatic or catechetical religious teaching. The dogmatic Church does not educate. Education ought to be essentially practical and religious, in order to form the moral conscience. The reading of the Bible, freely practised, will be a help to the attainment of this object, without taking into account the fact that the Bible will suit all confessions, Catholics as well as Protestants.

Professor Felice Tocco, of Florence, has expressed his religious opinions in lectures rather than in his writings. He hopes that one day the section of the clergy which is already weary of the uncompromising attitude of the Jesuits will have the courage to make its voice heard, not only below, but also above, which would be of greater value. In Italy, a reform of the Church outside of Catholicism not only would have no connecting link with the traditions of the past, but would remain a Utopia. The only reform which has any chance of success is the reform of the Church by the Church, as the great patriots, from Dante to Rosmini, have always desired. Laymen could not put themselves at the head of the movement without awakening suspicions and jealousies; as for the clergy, they are not free enough to venture on any such enterprise.

Professor C. Francesco Gabba desires before all things a disciplinary reform in Italy. The priests ought never to meddle with politics, and should devote themselves exclusively to moral and social education.

On Nov. 20, 1898, when the death of Savonarola was commemorated at Ferrara, Ernesto Masi, to whom the official speech was entrusted, called the Dominican the greatest conscience of the Renaissance, and did not conceal his regret that he had not dared to do more.

David Castelli.

Though I have set myself the task to speak only of the living, I cannot omit all reference to David Castelli, who died on Jan. 13, 1901. His religion—he was a Jew—had not prevented his appointment in 1876 as Professor of Hebrew at the Florence Faculty of Letters. He wrote numerous works, which show both a perfect knowledge of the Bible and a truly scientific method. He was the first in Italy to make known by his works the results of German criticism. Of all Italians, he was certainly the one who stood nearest to our Protestant theologians, or rather to our great masters of exegesis. If he was not their equal in depth and erudition, his knowledge was as sure as it was extensive, and he possessed one rare quality, the faculty of bringing his teaching within reach of minds quite unprepared for the great questions raised by the study of the Hebrew documents. His scientific testament is his "Political and Literary History of the Jews" (1899), a clear and precise résumé of the generally accepted results of modern criticism, an animated picture of Jewish life in conformity with its chronological development, and freed from the legends which make it less credible. If I add that he did not conceal his sympathy for Christianity, and that the pages he devoted to Jesus are among the most beautiful of his writings, you will understand the confidence inspired by the impartiality of this son of Israel.

Labanca.

Among the living, the first name I will recall to you is that of Baldassare Labanca, who has been Professor of the History of Christianity at Rome since 1886, and whose writings have been deservedly appreciated in Europe. In his opening lecture ("La Religione per le Università è un Problema, non un Assioma") he sets forth his principles. "In the first place," says he, "the History of Religions must not be a poem or a psalmody; it is not its duty to strike up the hymn of victory, nor to murmur the prayers of the dead to express this or that religious sentiment. Nor should the History of Religions be an apology or a polemic: its task is not to exalt one religion at the expense of another. Lastly, the History of Religions should not be a theology, nor a philosophy; it will not rest on dogmatic or systematic premises, nor will it weave its web, thread by thread, after a pattern supplied by theologians or philosophers. . . . . What is wanted to-day is a Religious History that shall be neither poetical, nor artistic, nor heroic, nor dogmatic, nor systematic, but critical; it must be founded on the study of the sources and dominated by the interest of truth for truth's sake."

These elevated principles, as praiseworthy as they are rare, have been put into practice by Signor Labanca in his writings and in his course of lectures on the History of Christianity. According to him, an impartial and independent study of the History of Christianity will lead to the overthrow of many prejudices and of many Catholic dogmas that were combated by the Reformers, and among the rest by the two Italians, Fausto and Lelio Socini. What Italy needs is a reasonable and civic Christianity; reasonable by being purged from thaumaturgical, eschatological, apocalyptical beliefs, which, though efficacious in the time of Jesus, are sterile in our day; civic in so far as it shall be adapted, on its ethical side, to the new individual and social requirements.

Signor Labanca has not sown the seed in vain. Several students of the University of Rome, at the close of their course of study, have already presented "theses" on religious subjects, and the younger generation is beginning to form an independent element which prepares a better future for Italy.

. . . . . .

Ecclesiastical Law.

In conclusion, I reserve a special paragraph for the subject of the teaching of Ecclesiastical Law in Italy.

It was on the point of being abolished, in 1873, at the time of the suppression of the Faculties of Theology. It was, however, admitted into the State Universities, but at first it remained sterile. The lectures continued to be given by the old professors appointed under the former régime, and this is still the case to-day at Rome. The old professors—trained not only in the methods, but also in the dogmatic and intolerant ideas of the days when this science, purely Catholic, was completely in the hands of the priests—taught nothing but the Canon Law.

The first who endeavoured to reform this state of things was Francesco Scaduto, born in 1858, a pupil of Hinschius, of Berlin, then professor at Palermo, and at present at Naples.

The movement was continued by Professor Fr. Ruffini (to whose kindness I owe these particulars). Signor Ruffini, born in 1863, is a Piedmontese. After studying for two terms at Leipzig under Friedberg, he was appointed professor successively at Pavia, at Genoa, and lastly at Turin.

The methods of these two jurists differ. Scaduto attaches more importance to the tribunals, while Ruffini insists on the scientific movement. But their aim is the same: the teaching of both is not only scientific, but essentially liberal. In their view, Ecclesiastical Jurisprudence is a pure science like any other, not belonging to the sectarian domain; more strictly speaking, a State science, i.e., a science which teaches the State how to behave towards the different churches, so as to guarantee to each the most unlimited liberty of thought.

* A Paper read to the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, at Essex Hall, on Friday afternoon, May 31. Some passages from Mr. André's paper we are obliged to omit on account of its length, but the whole will appear in the forthcoming volume.

Each of these professors has already a disciple. Scaduto, Professor Schiappoli, who, after hearing Hinschius lecture for a year, is now teaching at Pavia; Ruffini, Professor Galante, who completed his studies under Hinschius and Friedberg, and is now at the University of Innsbruck, where he cares for the Italian students in Austria. Other young jurists, trained by the two masters, are completing their studies in Germany, and it is a remarkable fact that they all, masters and pupils, have chosen Protestant professors. "The Catholic professors," Ruffini said to me, "have not the same impartiality; some of them, though very capable, are even intolerant. We who are Catholics, penetrated by Catholic ideas, could find no better way of attaining that absolute impartiality and serenity of judgment which we ardently desire to acquire, than by completing our politico-ecclesiastical education at a Protestant University."

The Liberal Leaven.

In short, Ecclesiastical Jurisprudence, the only branch of theological teaching now given in the Universities of Italy, is to-day penetrated with Liberal ideas. "We endeavour not to take sides with any particular religious movement," says Ruffini, "but we certainly cannot help regarding with sympathy the spread of religious tendencies favourable to liberty. We have a double aim: above all to protect the Italian State from the hostilities of the Catholic Church, and especially of the Roman Curia, and also to propagate religious Liberalism among the young generation that attends our lectures. The Protestant Churches may always be sure to find in us convinced and resolute defenders of the most unlimited liberty of conscience and of worship; it would be very difficult, however, for one of us to join the adherents of this or that confession, or to work for the spread of one catechism rather than another. Our highest aspiration is to make Italy a country in which religious liberty, to its full ideal extent, shall be guaranteed, not only by the laws, but also in practice, and that, if possible, in a more absolute and more complete fashion than in any other land."

These are noble words, and they point to an ideal worthy of all our sympathy. And even if the dream be too beautiful to be transformed in concrete reality, all honour to the men who trace out for their efforts the loftiest aim that it is possible for them to conceive!

Professor Ruffini has just published the first volume of a historical study on "Religious Liberty" (Turin, 1900) from the origin of the Church to our own day, in which we find his aspirations reflected. The most original feature in this first volume is the part that the author attributes to the Italians of the period of the Renaissance in the work of the Reformation. "While the Protestants," says he, "were working for the supremacy of dogma, the Italian Humanists, exiled from their country for religious motives, toiled for the nobler supremacy of the enlightened mind, which can suffer no coercion, nor any restriction of religious liberty." And in revealing to the Italians of to-day the noble deeds done by their forefathers on behalf of the most righteous of causes, he does not desire platonically to excite their national pride: his one aim is, I repeat it, to bring Italian thought back to Liberal traditions.

Summary of Conclusions.

In a rapid study like this, it was impossible to be complete, and I have only named representatives, so to speak, of the different currents of thought. The following sentences may serve as a résumé of what can be said on the subject:—

(1.) While welcoming the individual efforts of a few courageous men who prepare the way for future generations, we recognise that "there is nothing or very little in Italy that can be compared with the movement of religious thought that is to be seen in Protestant countries."

(2.) "In Italy, the religious problem is complicated by the national and patriotic question. As a result of this, there is in Catholicism a kind of latent and potential schism." The patriotic Catholics—those who are called in Italy Liberal Catholics—in presence of the uncompromising attitude of the Vatican, feel in their hearts the presentiment of a coming divorce.

(3.) Unhappily, as Senator Negri and Deputy Molmenti have remarked, "Italy is not the land of religious reforms. For such great reforms, the people must have a great ideal." "Children of our age, we have no longer a faith strong enough to make this schism evident and active; and, consequently, Italy rests on the strangest and most irrational of compromises, not having enough faith either to obey entirely or to disobey entirely."

(4.) Lastly, to quote the words of a Professor of Philosophy, Augusto Conti: "In Italy, a man is either a Catholic or a Rationalist; but rationalism has its own hypocricies. Many of those who boast of their free-thinking go to church with their families, and die as Christians."

This is a somewhat pessimistic declaration, but the professor is not altogether wrong.

In Italy, there is no Religious Liberalism, as we understand it: a power of higher life, putting the creature in direct contact with his Creator, without binding him to dogmatic formulæ—placing the religious sentiment in conscience, and making man greater by enlarging his responsibility, for noblesse oblige.

There is liberty of thought, boldness of criticism, opposition to the official dogmas, weakening of ecclesiastical ties, all in a sporadic manner—but all these things are a protest of offended reason; not the cry of conscience seeking to lay hold of God, wishing to feel Him near, and desiring to draw near to Him by personal experience.

The best minds are agitated by a feeling of distress; in the élite of the clergy and of the nation, it is the anguish of a crisis that many of us have known before reaching the haven,—the fear of losing faith itself, by losing the belief in the official dogmas, a fear which is all the greater where Catholicism has accustomed men's consciences to a passive acceptance of doctrines; and among those who have lost this belief, there is almost the conviction that they have no God any more, no religion any more, a hopeless thought for the old man who feels his end drawing near, and knows that the official Church has no favours except for those of her children whose fidelity does not stop short of blinding them.

Then, men hide their crisis. They do not dare to seek peace in discussion, in the exchange of ideas. Prudence obliges them to keep silence as completely as possible. They are afraid of committing themselves. They only utter half their thoughts. And if they talk little, they write still less; and, when they do write, you may be sure they do not say the quarter of what they think. If they did, they would find no publisher; the publishers rarely print a book at their own risk, unless it has the "imprimatur." And the book that, by dint of economy, perhaps of privation, authors print at their own expense, finds no readers; it has been marked out as dangerous. Besides, they risk losing their modest salary, and what can one do without bread and without home? Only the rich can have that independence, which is denied to the poor, however industrious. But between those written lines, which scarcely mark a slight progress, how many stifled cries, how many generous thoughts!

The Liberal movement, in Italy, is modest and timid; but on the classic soil of the Renaissance, it has promises for the future. For our part, we shall certainly aid its progress, in some measure, by assuring all those of our sympathy who have already pronounced themselves. Isolation kills—the hand stretched out fraternally sustains and encourages!

HUNGARIAN TRAVEL NOTES.—III.

IT was fitting that the last day in which our party remained unbroken—Sunday, Sept. 7—should be made memorable by our joining our Hungarian friends in their religious service at the Kolozsvar Unitarian Church. Apart from the service being conducted in, to us, an unknown tongue, we were reminded of different customs from ours by the fact that during the service the sexes are divided and that the congregation take no part in the singing—this being left to a male choir. One is struck with the animation and vivacity which is everywhere manifest in the Hungarian preacher. He seems to have made a study of effectiveness in manner and delivery, and he is always audible. On the conclusion of this service the Revs. T. Dunkerley, Broadrick and E. Ceredig Jones conducted a short service at which our Hungarian friends remained. We sang four hymns, and I am afraid that, from our forces being divided, our voices were not sufficiently powerful to fill the large church.

On leaving the church we went into the handsome new college buildings close by, passing the historic stone on which Francis David preached, and whose preaching in 1556 made so many converts to the Unitarian faith. Our friends have every reason to be proud of their new college, and we all regretted we could not be present at the formal opening ceremony. Provision is made for the board and education of about 400 boys, and the cost of the whole is estimated to be more than £50,000.

In the assembly hall of the college, round which are medallion portraits of Unitarian Bishops, a short meeting was held at which Bishop Ferencz presided. He explained the objects and purposes our friends had in view in erecting their splendid new college, and heartily welcomed his English friends there, Professor Kovacs interpreting the Bishop's speech, and adding one more to the many causes of thankfulness for his services to the English visitors. The Bishop was followed by one of the representatives of the local authority, who welcomed us to Kolozsvar.

Miss Tagart acknowledged these kindly greetings.

The evening was spent together in the hotel, and after some songs occasion was taken to thank the Carpathian Club, and their indefatigable secretary, for their wonderfully successful arrangements for our convenience and comfort. The evening closed on Miss Tagart being heartily thanked for the great trouble she had taken in organising such a thoroughly enjoyable excursion. The Unitarian who visits Transylvania cannot fail to be greatly heartened by the spirit and the enthusiasm which he meets with amongst the Unitarians of that country. All through the country we had many illustrations of a broad catholicity of spirit on the part of members of other faiths towards us which is unknown in England. The Unitarian visitor to Transylvania really runs a great risk of being "killed by kindness," if he listens to all the appeals which are made to him for his entertainment and enjoyment; and though it is the second time the present writer has been amongst them, he will only be too glad if in the coming years he should be able once more to pass a few days amongst his friends of the faith in Transylvania. W.

HUNGARIAN FUNCTIONS.—III.

FROM Mr. Spedding's further notes of meetings we regret that we can find space only for the following selections:—

At Deva, Monday, Sept. 2.

Late on Monday night the train reached Deva, in whose Castle Francis David perished. Professor Kovacs, of Kolozsvar, speaking after dinner, described the place as sacred ground, because of its association with the martyred bishop, and quoted the lines which he cut into the wall of his prison cell: "Neither the sword of the Pope, nor the image of torture and death—nay, no earthly power shall stop truth in its course. I write what I feel, and what I have felt; and I have truly preached with a trusting soul. And I am firmly convinced that after my death the doctrine of false preachers will perish."

At Torosko, Thursday, Sept. 5.

After a brief rest a special service was held in the great church, over 800 persons being present. The minister said they could not help making this a real festive day for the village. He prayed for their visitors and for themselves, and announced his text Psalms cxiv. 24, rendered into English: "This is the day ordered by the Lord, let us be gay and joyful together." Explaining the passage he spoke of his personal joy in speaking before the Unitarians of two nations. International intercourse gave impulse not only to single persons but to nations also. The discourse was full of the warmest regard for England, and especially for the little handful of travellers whose presence meant cheer and courage for the minds in the lonely hill-land. Its last words were a prayer for a helping hand from God for the farther journey. God keep your country and keep your love for your country; God keep and give us power also to love our country, to love religion and to love knowledge.

The Rev. W. Harrison (Stalybridge) took part in the service; Rev. W. J. Davies sang the Magyar anthem and the choir followed with "God save the King."

At Kolozsvar.

Late as the hour was (Sept. 5, 10 P.M.), many friends were at the station, and a brief but hearty welcome was given by Mr. Petofi, who spoke for "the most ancient congregation of our faith," and described the town as one of the fortresses of human culture and of human liberty.

Miss Tagart said: "I thank you, Mr. Petofi, and all the ladies and gentlemen assembled here for your kind welcome. This is the goal of our pilgrimage. We are pilgrims come to your country; and it is because it is the seat of the religion we love, that we feel in harmony with sentiments of the highest kind. To the members of the Carpathian Society also we are indebted for the greatest comfort and help of our journey. We thank you heartily for your kind welcome."

On Sunday, Sept. 8, service was held in the church, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Andrew Moses from the text, Rom. i. 8. The Hungarian was followed by an English service, conducted by Revs. T. Dunkerley and T. B. Broadrick, and a sermon on "Symmetrical Completeness" was preached by the Rev. E. C. Jones. Miss Funnel, of Lewes, presided at the organ.

After the service a visit was made to the magnificent pile of buildings, which form the new college to be opened on the 22nd. A meeting was held in the Hall, Bishop Ferencz presiding. The address was interpreted by Professor Kovacs.

The Bishop regretted that he could not sufficiently speak the English tongue to express in it his deep feeling. Their friends came to Hungary, perhaps to admire its beauty and its towns and cities, and to see Kolozsvar. They came to visit Deva, where their first Hungarian Bishop, Francis David, suffered martyrdom, and where he had written on the walls words which they had already heard. They came to visit Castle Hunyad, where their greatest King, Matthew Corvinus, spent his days, and their greatest hero, John Hunyad, lived—the great defender of Christian peace. They came to Torda, that famous town where, first in all the world, freedom of conscience was proclaimed. They had come to see these and many other things, but he was convinced that they had come not only for the sake of these historical memorials, they came as well to see the Hungarian Unitarians; and he only wished that events had so fallen out that they might have witnessed the opening of that grand building. But he was glad they were there that day. He should never forget that morning's hour of worship of the only one living God, which they spent together. The singing of the Lord's Prayer had touched his heart. They used to sing it in former times, and it might be resumed. The service had shown more clearly that the English nation was the most devout, the most religious nation in the world. He would like to say a few words about their college building. As they knew from history—and as they had heard to-day beside that great boulder*—Kolozsvar was the centre of Unitarianism. It was the creator of their dear Unitarian religion. Francis David preached on that stone, so that the enthusiastic people took him on their shoulders, and carried him into the Cathedral, which thereafter for 150 years belonged to the Unitarians. Was it any wonder, then, that from that time they called this place the Jerusalem of Hungary? From thence Unitarianism went into other places of Transylvania. But not only as concerning religion, but for education also Kolozsvar was the centre for the Unitarians. It was true that they got their first college with the conversion of the people. But that first college was taken from them in 1693. They then removed just opposite the Cathedral. But even with this second college they were not allowed to have rest. Again force was used, and that college was taken from them along with the beautiful church. For twenty years they were looking for another place where they might start again. At length they were able to build another, a third college, owing to the generosity of that man, Ladislaus Suki. Time came when they must leave this third college. But the circumstances were not as they had been on the other occasions.

They were coming to this new fourth college with goodwill and joy. They had a grand building now, so that they might go further and further in the good work. He could not close without a word about that first English minister who came to see them, to bring fresh spirit to them, and to tell that, beyond the ocean on the west, there was a nation that had Unitarians, and that they should be orphaned, they should be alone no more, for the English Unitarians were their brethren, worshipping in the same way the only one God. He came to bring them cheer, and that they might forget their sufferings. That man came to them, but he could not, in returning, reach the soil of his grand country. He died in Holland, and he (the Bishop) was the first man who visited in England the orphaned lady who was their guest that day. He was the first lad who went to England, and enjoyed English hospitality in 1859, and after him followed a long succession of young men who studied in Manchester College. And now he blessed God that he had lived so long as to be able to greet that lady who came to Hungary in her childhood, and who had now brought with her this great company of ladies and gentlemen. I pray God, the Bishop concluded, that God may bless you all; that He may lead you home on his right arm; and may lead you safely into your dear country.

The address, which was followed with close attention, deeply impressed all who were present.

Miss Tagart, in responding, conveyed the greetings of the Women Workers' Union, and of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The Rev. T. Dunkerly also spoke for the B. and F. Association, and when Miss Tagart had announced that on their return to England the visitors

* A large boulder on the south side of the church, removed from Torda-street, bearing the following inscription in Hungarian:—"Francis David, according to tradition, when he arrived from the Diet of Gyula Tehervar in 1566, preached on this boulder-stone, at the corner of Torda-street, that sermon by which the whole Kolozsvar congregation were converted to the Unitarian religion. This stone was placed here in 1884."

intended to make some effort to increase the College Professorial Fund, the proceedings terminated.

LITERATURE.

UNITARIAN AFFIRMATIONS.*

THE title of his book is chosen, Mr. Herford says in the Introduction, "to convey the fact that the religion which Unitarians hold is not built up on denials, negations, rejections of what other people believe, but rests upon positive grounds, upon what is held to be most real and most true"; and the purpose of the lectures, which is admirably fulfilled, is to set forth, clearly and simply, what Unitarians generally affirm on the great subjects dealt with: "God," "Jesus Christ," "The Bible," "The Church," "The Future Life," "Faith and Freedom." The spirit of the lectures is shown in the remark that the duty of Christians who hold different forms of doctrinal belief is "not to try and convert each other, but to try and understand each other, so as to be able to see how it is and why it is that they express their belief in different ways." And for those who have no settled religious belief, Mr. Herford's hope is to show a better way.

To such I want to show that there is a form of religion, strong, deep, and simple, which places no restrictions upon thought or inquiry, which is afraid of nothing that science can prove, which stands in no danger from the extremest criticism of the Bible, because it holds that all truth—wherever it appears—is divine and to be received and honoured as such. It is a religion which we Unitarians know from long experience to be helpful and sustaining. It does not bid us believe this and that, as mysteries of faith to be accepted without question. It bids us look doctrines, as well as facts, in the face, and worship with the eyes of our mind wide open. It is a religion to live by. And I say the truth of many good men and women, yes and children, whom I have known, when I add that it is a religion to die by.

In simple, and often homely phrase, desiring to speak directly to plain people, Mr. Herford makes his affirmations. Our fundamental faith in God, as the Father Almighty, he shows to be established by three converging lines of thought, satisfying the intellect, giving its complete meaning to conscience, and as the natural outcome of our highest and purest feelings; and this faith, in its elements natural to man, is confirmed and strengthened by the general experience of the race, but chiefly by those who have had the deepest experience, the prophets and teachers of mankind. Thus the inestimable work of the Bible is seen, as the chief record of that experience, and the place of Jesus, as above all others the revealer of God to man.

Touching upon the great doctrines of the orthodox creed, Mr. Herford says:—

> I shall not try to show that the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation are erroneous; but they are not the only way of expressing the truths contained in them. And the general Unitarian position is this: that the truths of the nearness and the love of God and the reality of personal communion with Him may be stated in a form much simpler than those great doctrines.
> The root-meaning of the doctrine of the Trinity I take to be the assurance of personal communion with a living and loving God. Nothing less than the passionate desire for such assurance would have triumphed, for all those centuries, over the intellectual difficulties which, no one will deny, are presented by the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation. When, therefore, Unitarians decline to accept those doctrines, it is not that they claim to know that God is one and that He is not three Persons; it is that they have learnt what seems to them "a more excellent way" of expressing their assurance of personal communion with a living and loving God. Trinitarians and Unitarians are both trying to say the same thing—namely, that God is a living spirit of love, with whom we can hold communion. We all believe that; Unitarians quite as much as Trinitarians. We differ only in how we say it. And Unitarians claim the right to say it in the way that seems truest to them, without being condemned for not saying it in someone else's way.
> He then proceeds to show how the thought of God as our Father in heaven, which was at the heart of the religion of Jesus, really satisfies most fully and completely our deepest religious needs, and pleads that the spiritual fact of communion with the living God is the same with us and with others, even when they say "Christ," and we, with Jesus, say "Our Father."
> From the second lecture, on "Jesus Christ," we quoted in our leading article of July 27, when speaking of Mr. Herford's Provincial Assembly sermon. It has a special interest as containing the record of a genuine personal experience, and as clearly setting forth the results of an earnest study of the Gospels. It should help many to a clearer conception of what the real Jesus may be to us in our religious life, as among men the supreme revealer of God. And the same may be said of Mr. Herford's treatment of the Bible, in connection with which, of course, the question of inspiration has to be dealt with.
> God fulfils Himself in many ways, and has spoken through other than Hedrew and Greek lips. No nation of the world has He left without a witness of Himself. But the Bible is the record of His revelation to those from whom we have learnt; and as we read in its pages, we discern yet the glow and glory of God that shone in the souls of prophet and saint—the true inspiration that makes the Bible, indeed, Holy Scripture. And, with a far higher thought of God than as a mere dictator of ancient words, with a faith in Him as the living God, who has not spoken His last work eighteen centuries ago, and shut up His revelation in the two covers of a book, we may gratefully thank Him that in the course of His providence the Bible came to be written; and make it our prayer, as we close the book in which we have read of noble lives that were lived in the days of old, "The Lord God be with us, as he was with our fathers."
> From the other lectures we must refrain from quoting. In speaking of "The Church," Mr. Herford clearly distinguishes between the human institution and that greater spiritual fellowship, not confined within the limits of doctrinal exclusiveness. The doctrine of "The Future Life" is rightly based upon the supreme truth of the love of God, in which is contained the answer to all our questions, and the promise of more than all that we can yet conceive or hope. In the concluding lecture on "Faith and Freedom," Mr. Herford expounds the fundamental principles of our religious life, free from the restraints of dogmatic limitation, principles with which the "Unitarian" name has to make its peace as best it may. But that is a question about which Mr. Herford declines to be troubled.
> In conclusion, we will say that these are wholesome and helpful lectures, which we trust will be widely used among those who are looking for such guidance, and in that quiet ministry which the Postal Missions exercise. The two lectures on "Jesus Christ" and "The Future Life" may also be had in pamphlet form (price 2d. each), for separate distribution.

TOWARDS RE-UNION?

THE Methodist Œcumenical Conference received a letter of friendly greeting from the Bishop of London, who, after referring to Wesley's love for the Church of England, and the fact that he never formally withdrew from it, wrote as follows:—

It is that love of your founder for the Church to which he belonged which makes us in the Church of England feel a special interest in that body of Christians which your Conference represents, and we deeply regret the causes which led to the formation of Wesleyans into a separate organisation. While we recognise with admiration the zeal and fervent love displayed by your body in good works throughout the world, and the noble generosity which has contributed well-nigh a million pounds to your special commemoration fund, it is still our hope and prayer that in the Providence of God it may one day be reunited to the old Church from which you and we equally recognise that it sprung. May God guide your deliberations by His Holy Spirit, and make them fruitful for the good of the world and helpful towards the reunion of Christendom.

The reply on behalf of the Conference, dated from Wesley's Chapel, Sept. 10, was drafted by the Rev. T. B. Stephenson, and, after opening words of acknowledgment, ran as follows:—

The historic connection of early Methodism with the Anglican Church and our obligations to the scholarship and saintship of your communion makes such a message of goodwill very welcome to our hearts. Though the last thing we should wish is to make the reception of such a letter as yours an opportunity for controversy, the desire definitely expressed in your letter appears to require an answer as definite. The conference represents the whole family of Methodist Churches throughout the world. Differing in some non-essential points of Church government they are alike in creed in the main principles of Church organisation and in the accepted modes of Christian fellowship, and they are in full communion with each other. In some respects, therefore, the relation of this conference to the Methodist Churches is similar to that of the Pan-Anglican Synod to the Anglican Churches. But the conference differs from the synod in the fact that it is composed of representative ministers and laity. It has no authority over the constituent Churches, but affects them powerfully by its discussions, its tone, and influence.

From this you will see that your suggestion respecting a possible union of the Methodists with the Anglican Church raises vast and far-reaching issues. Of the many millions of Methodists represented here probably six-sevenths live in the United States or in portions of the British Empire in which there is no establishment of religion by law. Of the remaining seventh a very large majority would not consent to part with the perfect independence now enjoyed by the Churches to which they belong under the sole headship of Christ our Lord. You will see how powerfully this fact bears upon your suggestion.

But a great and more permanent difficulty lies in the way. We are not aware that any constituted authority in the Church of England has expressed the willingness of that Church to recognise the validity of the ministry and sacraments which we possess and cherish. That being so, any consent of ours to a movement towards corporate union with the Anglican Church would be an acknowledgment of an invalidity and inferiority of our Church order which our convictions would not allow us to make.

None the less do we appreciate the courtesy and kindliness of your communication. We pray that God may richly bless the efforts of yourself and your brethren for the spiritual and social uplifting of the population of this country. We are ready to co-operate with our Anglican brethren in all good works, so far as the beliefs and practices of your Church will allow, and we wish to maintain the traditional policy of the Methodist Church expressed by Wesley himself in his famous phrase, "We desire to be the friends of all and the enemies of none."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Kiss for a Blow.

As I sat on the shore one day watching the tide, the thought came to me that the rocks and the sea had a perpetual quarrel with one another, and I wondered why it should be so, when each was so beautiful and interesting in its own way. The afternoon was very hot and still, and I was content to let my hands rest idle in my lap while I gave myself up to the pleasure of listening and looking. Perhaps I grew a little bit sleepy too, as who would not have done under the circumstances?

On either side of me high cliffs ran out crowned with grass like velvet, but sharp and brown and rugged enough lower down where only a few daring limpets ventured to make their homes—I might have said pitch their tents, for, as most children know, a limpet's house is very like a tent in shape. A blue sky, dotted with soft white clouds, looking like little pieces of cotton-wool very much pulled out so as to be quite thin, and a large stretch of lovely pale-green water—these were all that could be seen above and in front. Firm sand, sprinkled with stones of every colour, formed the floor, or carpet, of this delightful spot. It was just one of Nature's drawing-rooms set out for her children to play in, but being all window and no roof there was neither stuffiness nor dust, and so it was quite perfect.

Very still everything was that day. Even the tide came in creeping, creeping, like a nurse walking on tip-toe lest she should wake the baby. Presently a sea-gull sailed across the space, startling the silence with his "Cawk! Cawk!" He seemed a thing cut out of grey velvet, but when he glided downwards in a slanting line and rested on the sea he looked like a common duck. Next moment he dived and came up some distance away to ride on the smooth green surface once more. Then something spoke. It was the rock on my right hand side, and very brown and cross I thought he looked when I examined his side-face.

"Here you come, you impudent little creatures!" he exclaimed, addressing the wavelets. "Twice a day, winter and summer, week after week, month after month, always the same annoyance from you. Why will you not stop your little game, I should like to know?"

"Because it is our little game and always will be. Yes, you are quite right, Mr. Rock," a wave replied, crawling slowly an inch nearer than she had done last time, and laughing gaily.

"Always wasting time, never doing any real work," grumbled the rock.

"Oh, play is our work, you know," another wave said, catching her sister by the skirts and almost overtaking her. "It is our duty to play, as you call it, just as it is yours to do nothing but look cross and wrinkle up your face into hard lines."

"Do nothing, indeed!" repeated the rock. "Wrinkles, too!" he added, under his breath. "Pray, who filled your head with that nonsense?"

"The moon is our school-mistress," the waves replied, and with a rippling laugh several of them joined hands and ran along the sand right up to the rock's foot.

"Humph!" grunted the surly fellow. "I've heard of Lady Moon, of course, and she is said to be a shining light in her way, but I doubt if she is very wise. What does she know about me, for instance? I'd like to see her teaching me anything."

"Well, she makes us obey her, and we love her dearly, and so we dance about all night and day because she wishes us to be in good practice."

"You are not working very hard now, at all events. Why, a sea-snail would crawl about as fast as you all did that time."

"Ah! we can do a much quicker step, cannot we?" and one, more talkative than the rest, lifted her head and turned towards her companions. "I should think so, indeed! Old Mr. Rock knows us in all our moods, and he likes us in none of them. He is a hard, sulky, stern fellow, and there is no pleasing him," two or three of the others replied altogether. "Let us sprinkle him, just for fun!" cried she, who seemed the leading spirit among them.

Though all appeared at first to dance the same steps, I now discovered a change in the figure. It might have been going on all the time, although I had not observed it. Against the projecting cliff on my left hand the water was beginning to eddy gently but surely, in obedience to the incoming tide, and when the little ripples in front took hands and slid along the level sand, another set of partners came creeping from behind this rock and joined their friends with a sparkling smile. I fancied some had tears in their eyes, but perhaps it was only my fancy. It might have been only the bubble of laughter on their lips which caught the sunshine and shimmered like diamonds.

At that moment something attracted my eye far out over the sea. All had been smooth and even glassy save for a quiet heaving which stirred, without breaking, the surface, like some strange creature softly breathing in its sleep. But now a change was taking place, and it came in the form of a deeper colour spreading over the water, caused by a ruffling of the surface. What had been glassy now dimpling into tiny wavelets. It was the wind bringing a message to the land.

On it came, strong and salt, carrying the tide with it, driving the wayward waves before it with friendly force, meeting those which were running backward and catching them up only to push them on again. Helping some, hindering others, tossing a few into one another's arms, and even, oh, horror! flinging an armful of salt water into the face of crabbed Mr. Rock himself. Then up the beach swept the wind and sprang over the high headland and away to the sea-pinks, the heather and the gorse. Away too to the hill-sides where mushrooms grew, the blackberry bushes also, and those bent and stunted shrubs and hedges which his rude kisses had gradually shaven so close that one might almost have walked upon them. Away, away, who knows how many miles that joyous breeze travelled when once he started

LONDON, SEPTEMBER 21, 1901.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY.

WHEN last January our QUEEN passed peacefully away, laying down the burden of her more than eighty years, with all the natural and inevitable sorrow there was a thankful sense of completeness. One felt that here was a finished life, that had been wonderfully rich in beneficence, that its power of blessing would still remain, and that old age had well earned such a release.

With the PRESIDENT of the American Republic it is very different. He was not yet sixty years of age, in the fullness of his powers, recently elected for the second time to the highest place among his people, with his best work, as we may well believe, still to be done—and suddenly, he is struck down by the hand of insane and dastardly crime. During the days of suspense we have been brought very near to our kindred across the sea; with them we have watched with admiration the endurance of a brave and true man, the cheerful courage with which he determined, if it might be, to keep his hold on life, and the quiet resignation with which he accepted the inevitable; we have been touched by the knowledge of his deep affections, the beautiful spirit of his home life, and the thought of what this tragedy must mean to his stricken wife and his closest friends; and now in the time of mourning we are with them in heartfelt sympathy, and in grief that a life devoted to high service should be so ended.

If MCKINLEY is not to be named with LINCOLN for the part he played in making the history of his people, he will yet be remembered with him and with GARFIELD as having been struck down on the field of honourable service, in the midst of labours for his country's good, and as a true man who knew how to live and how to die.

Many words of admiration for the fallen PRESIDENT and of sympathy with the American people have been fitly spoken; the KING has well expressed the feeling of this country, and in many churches tributes eloquent of genuine sorrow have been rendered. Among the chief utterances in this country, in the wisdom of its insight, was that by Canon SCOTT HOLLAND in St. Paul's Cathedral last Sunday. His words as reported in the Times were as follows :—

After all, the dreaded disaster had happened, and the President lay dead. Vigorous and hopeful, his buoyant energy made death seem to him, almost to the last, incredible, and his fine temper and patience did all that could be done to save the wounded life from sinking, but the organs were too fatally injured, and he was gone! Throughout his dignity and simplicity never failed him, and, when he knew that he must die, he met the verdict with frank courage and tender regard for others, and with spiritual thoughtfulness. With his last words he committed himself to the God that he tried to serve in life.

There were few more touching sights shown to travellers abroad than the three bloody soutanes in the sacristy of Nôtre Dame, which recalled by their blood-stains the three murdered Archbishops of Paris. But these belonged, after all, to the romantic story of the old worn-out world, loaded with tyrannies and wrongs. The tragic significance of the three murdered Presidents — Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley—lay in the fact that they belonged to the New World, which, as we once dreamed, had escaped from the nightmare of our evil memories, and had set out, as with a clean canvas, to live its free life and to do its own will, unburdened and uncursed; and the tragedy was at its height in this last crime, when the President was killed in the very act of manifesting the perfect equality of citizenship by holding out his hand to all who desired to take it. The very equality which allowed this freedom of access was utilised to cover and assist the blow by which he was slain.

The great hope that once was felt by humanity lay slain in that act. The New World had the like bitterness to work through as the Old World. They must face it calmly, and not allow themselves to be driven into fierce reaction by the panic of that insane crime—not for that did the poor President lie dead. That great nation of our kinsfolk over the sea would hold its passion under control, and with renewed humility and serious resolution we must one and all work together still for that new order of social righteousness which had ever been, for them and for us, the Anglo-Saxon ideal. In that new order it would become impossible for a passion issuing in such an outrage to exist, for all the wrongs of man would have been undone and all such dreadful deeds as that which now appalled us would become as the weird and terrible legends told to awe-struck children out of a long-buried and forgotten time.

From our own pulpits many words of profound sympathy were spoken, far beyond what it is possible for us to report, but the following reports may serve as representing, amid natural differences of judgment, the feeling of our churches as a whole.

THE REV. C. J. STREET, AT BANK-STREET CHAPEL, BOLTON.

The tragic event which has cruelly robbed a sister nation of its noble ruler, while still in the prime of life, must be in the minds of us all this morning, mingling feelings of sorrow with our harvest rejoicing. It is the way of life that while one is glowing with happiness, his neighbour may be bowed down with grief. Our own experience is often a curious medley of differing emotions, so that we scarcely know whether to laugh or cry. It is well for us when we have learnt the lesson which I have been trying to teach this morning. We can then look deeper into the heart of things, and check the initial promptings of dismay and despair. Mr. McKinley himself has shown us the spirit in which we should take this catastrophe. Calmest of all, his first thoughts and words were of his wife and of his assailant. Love for the partner of his joys and sorrows, and compassion for the wretch who had betrayed him, as with a Judas kiss, mingled in his first thoughts. It was no mere maudlin sentiment that prompted him to say of the assassin—"Don't hurt him," and later on, "Too bad, too bad; I trust, though, he will be treated with all fairness." The President was a true Christian; and never was the fact so evident as when he was thus suddenly stricken with a mortal wound. The plea for his enemy was directed against popular passion and possible injustice. It was of the same spirit as the sacred words of Jesus on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." And, indeed, the miscreants who think to advance their revolutionary schemes by destroying the head of the State are but blind fools. If there is anything in their grounds of complaint against the established order of things, the fatuous and wicked course they take is certain to alienate every shred of sympathy, and give better cause for their complaint. We need not spend our sympathy on the murderer except to pray that God's grace may yet touch his heart with repentance before he is called to his own account. But for the wife who is thus cruelly bereaved, and for the people who are plunged into mourning for a President whom they honoured and loved, our sympathies go forth freely. At a time like this all distinctions of race and country disappear, all national jealousies and disputes are silenced. The whole civilised world will recoil in horror from the dastardly attack of a traitor, and the sorrow of the great American people will be shared by every nation. Britain especially must feel this tragedy as though it were a personal experience, for blood is thicker than water, and the ties of kinship with our brethren over the sea are very strong. Some day they will be strong enough to establish an alliance on behalf of the peace of the world, but the time for that harvest is not yet. Let us do our share of work to bring it to pass. And if our hearts are heavy as we think of the growing audacity and cunning of the assassin, so that we are tempted to cry, "Hath God forgotten to be gracious?" let us cast aside the hasty impulse, and gather the telling lessons of the past; let us think not so much of the premature death as of the rich and valuable life that was spared so long to do its honourable work; let us set our faces with firmer resolve to the future, while we "remember the years of the right hand of the Most High."

THE REV. A. N. BLATCHFORD, AT LEWIN'S MEAD, BRISTOL.

America and Britain, the preacher said, were bound together in the same solemn fellowship of a common grief. Not a year has passed since the warm sympathy of our brethren in America was laid upon the steps of our throne, made vacant when our late beloved Queen passed into the final peace; and our fellow-feeling was all the deeper, and the more instant, from the fashion of the catastrophe which had swept so noble-minded a man from his sphere of honour, and of usefulness to his country. Men stood aghast at the spectacle of a crime so cruel and so purposeless. It was no tyrant against whom some victim of his remorseless sway struck back in wild revenge. It was a man right worthy of the name, a magistrate of a liberty-loving land, who ruled only for his people, and by his people's express and willing mandate. Such was the stainless victim of this brutal and insensate outrage, and who would wonder if, in view of such a deed, civilised power felt itself constrained to revise its relations with all who by their inflammatory teachings, as well as by their overt acts, proclaimed themselves the foes of civilisation the whole world over? It might be that the end would be a vastly different one to that at which the hand of the assassin aims; that end might be the stripping away from liberty of that wild licence, which had too long been masquerading under its honoured name. But afer all, the real pathos of the sad event lay in the simplicity and manliness of the victim who had suffered and died at the head of his sorrowing nation. As McKinley passed "to where beyond these voices there is peace," there was the samé brave and gentle spirit within him that Lincoln and Garfield had manifested in their days of undeserved suffering and fate. With McKinley there was the same consideration for his murderers. Such men as these lifted earthly power into a sacred trust, and by their own characters they purified and elevated the seat of empire itself. Right well might the great Methodist Church, that bred such a spirit, be proud and thankful for its manifestation in so true and worthy a representative of its religious principles. "He being dead yet speaketh," and he surely tells us that the virtue of sweet and affectionate home-life is compatible with the most incessant public duty, and the widest exercise of earthly power. Verily his sun has gone down while it is yet day, but with him, as with every soul swayed by loyalty and simple duty, we feel assured that "the readiness is all."

THE REV. DR. WARSCHAUER, AT OAKFIELD-ROAD, CLIFTON.

Taking for his text Amos viii. 8-9, the preacher observed that it was not too much to say that no such spasm of universal grief and pain had passed over this nation since the decease, eight months ago, of the beloved Queen Victoria; and also that towards the head of no other State could a sentiment so wide in range and deep in character have gone forth, proving beyond all contradiction the genuineness of that sense of kinship which united the Anglo-Saxon race the world over. That sense, which in times of prosperity might slumber, needed only some national crisis to assert itself unmistakeably. When England was called upon to mourn for Victoria, amid the mournings of all the nations of the earth, whose manifestations of sorrow had touched our hearts so intimately as America's? And now that America in turn had lost her justly-admired first citizen, England claimed, and knew it did not claim in vain, the sad privilege of associating herself with her sister's sorrow in a manner reserved for no other nationality. America could not be wounded but England must needs feel the pain; and by the death of her President, under circumstances which must call up the horror, the compassion, the indignation of all but the outcasts of society, not one but two great nations were plunged into gloom. From all wider considerations, such as the part played by Mr. McKinley in the field of statesmanship, and the means of counteracting the disease of anarchism, they must inevitably turn in that hour back to the purely human aspect of the great tragedy. They were all familiar with the line, "Nothing in his life became him like the leaving it"; that line applied with singular aptitude to William McKinley. His had, indeed, been a good and useful life; but it gained a new and even greater distinction, a pathos of its own, from the manner of its close. They could not but recall his first words when he realised that he had been shot: "Don't make too much of this to Mrs. McKinley." Then followed the heroic struggle for recovery, promising so well; then the sudden knowledge that he could not be plucked back from the dark valley, and the absolute resignation of his farewell: "Good-bye, all, good-bye. It is God's way. His will be done." Finally the dying man's last audible words: "Nearer my God to Thee!" There was nothing to be added here; one felt the awe of it, and withal the unearthly beauty; comment would be desecration. The sermon concluded with a feeling reference to Mrs. McKinley, and the earnest prayer that God might grant her His consolation and fortitude to bear her heavy sorrow.

THE REV. H. S. PERRIS, AT LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL, LONDON.

The whole civilised world, the preacher said, had been thrown into mourning by the odious deed which had resulted in the death of the American President; and we in Britain might claim to share, in a special degree, in the sorrow which had come to our kinsmen beyond the sea. Not even the heads of the great Democracies had been spared by the assassin's knife and bullet. This Anarchist terrorism and violence was indefensible and hateful. No extenuation was possible of such cruel and useless deeds. It was of little use, however, to raise the cry of vengeance and repression. It remained for Society to study the social and political conditions which gave birth to these monsters and fanatics. Modern civilisation had made great progress in many ways; yet there were plenty of problems, new and old, for Democracy still to solve. What awful social contrasts still existed—even in the most democratic states! The United States was a young nation, yet it was overridden by plutocracy, and, as a partial consequence, had already begun to create a discontented proletariate. Society, with its worship of the Golden Calf, had many sins to answer for. God grant that this tragedy might in some measure serve as an atonement and purification! It was idle to deny that one of the causes of Anarchism was the often cruel and heartless character of the reign of plutocracy and privilege. During the last week an international gathering had been taking place for the purpose of exposing Anarchism of another, and still more dangerous type. The Peace Congress had been meeting at Glasgow. What was its object? The abolition of legalised murder, pillage, and devastation on a great scale—i.e., of national and international Anarchism. We were horrified, and justly, when an individual, highly-placed, respected and revered, was struck down by an assassin. Yet, when thousands perished by violence in war, and liberty was crushed and homes laid waste, we scarcely felt a thrill. And why? Because the false halo of "patriotism" and the extenuating circumstances of "political necessity" had been thrown over it all. Yet the truth was that, just as the one thing was hateful and repulsive, so the other was hateful and repulsive, only on a much vaster and more appalling scale. In one case, as in the other, physical force is regarded as the only remedy, and the only argument. Yet, in reality, it is no argument, and no remedy at all. Right should not be purchased by wrong and wicked methods. The innocent should not be slain because of social or political abuses or disagreements. Religion must organise itself, and protest with all its great power against these methods of individualistic propaganda, on the one hand, and these bloody roads to trade and Empire, on the other. Christianity was intended to be the reign of Love, not of physical force, whether of the Anarchist's bomb and bullet, or the lyddite shell and bayonet variety. Where did Love reign to-day? Let the answer to that question point them to the work they had to do, the witness they had to make, and the prayers they had to offer.

THE REV. C. HARGROVE, AT MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

A terrible calamity, the preacher said, had fallen upon America, England, and the world. It was not that the President's death had been compassed by violence, or that the mourning for him was deeper, because murder was common, and tears flowed in torrents always, and hearts were broken every day; but it was because that one man represented in his person a mighty nation, all of whom were wounded by what had stricken him, and who all together mourned his loss. The same bullet pierced ten million hearts; the faithful wife's moan for her life's partner lost to her was echoed by the lamentation of States united now in the common grief, and in sympathy born of the common danger, and over common calamities; all the kings of the earth were stirred on their thrones, and every nation trembled for its own ruler and its own peace. How should not we feel for those with whom we had such common ties! An insult had been offered to humanity by a fool; a reversal had taken place of the vote of millions by the act of a single nobody. Vengeance might be demanded; "tear him to pieces" might be cried, but would it deter future offenders? Of what good had ever violence been in the world? "The criminal, as the poor, are always with us." The one and the only remedy for this terrible state of affairs was the righteousness of God; when that was established all would be well; righteousness between employer and employed, between nation and nation, between ruler and subjects, between rich and poor.

THE REV. HENRY GOW, AT THE GREAT MEETING, LEICESTER.

"The night cometh when no man can work."—John ix. 4.

The thoughts of the civilised world have been lately turned towards death. The representative of a great people has been struck down in the fulness of his power, and we are moved with awe as we feel once again how near is death to the plenitude of earthly life. Our hearts are all touched with sympathy as we remember the family and friends of the dead President, and our feelings of kinship and kindliness are deepened towards the great nation which of all the nations of the earth is most nearly related to ourselves. What affects them affects us too: there is a hidden sympathy between us which trouble brings into the light.

I am not going to attempt any eulogy of the man whose death we all deplore. It must be based on very insufficient knowledge and could hardly fail to be conventional and exaggerated. The great tragedy of death is not an occasion for inventing virtues and allowing a kindly imagination to run riot in default of facts.

He was the man twice chosen by his country for its leader. He was the best and most competent man the people could find, acting on electoral methods long tried and well thought out. He had risen from obscurity to the highest, most responsible place in one of the greatest nations of the world. There must be sterling qualities, strength, ability, integrity to enable any man to gain and hold so high a place amongst a self-respecting, keen, strong people. And now he is struck down, not even for any pretended wrong-doing in himself, but simply because he was the representative and head. The absurdity of such a crime against the leader of a free people in a land where vast numbers of the poor and persecuted of many nations have found happiness and peace, is only equalled by the wickedness of it. The first feeling in all our hearts is sympathy—personal sympathy for the man cut down in his prime, which we ought to feel for any man in any position of usefulness, and international sympathy with a nation mourning for their leader.

There are always some people at such a time who, amidst the large and general expressions of sorrow, ask why we need sympathise more with a leader than with the meanest of his followers. The pang is just as great, the disappointment often quite as bitter, the reluctance to leave a happy useful life may be alike; and in the case of many poor men suddenly struck down, there is the added misery which rich men do not know, of leaving wife and children unprotected from the rough usage of the world. Amid the general condolences such objectors are silent and even harden their hearts against sympathy because it seems to them so overdone. For my own part I am not so much a despiser of my fellow-men as to think that a general sentiment and common course of action can be altogether unfair and absurd. No doubt we ought to feel more sympathy with the weak and the obscure. Our fault lies not in sympathising much with the prominent and well known, but in sympathising so little with the inconspicuous and lowly. But the leader rightly claims our especial attention and our especial interest quite apart from personal affection. He is more than a separate individual: he is the representative of his people, he is the symbol of law and order and national power. It is not merely that on his wisdom and character depend great issues: a self-ruling, independent people will not be frightened or overwhelmed even by the death of their strongest and wisest. But as the symbol of government and authority his life has a significance far greater than that of the private man, and at his death it is altogether right that there should be a more wide-spread emotion and sympathy than in the case of other men.

The second feeling, I suppose, with most of us is reprobation of the crime, and a feeling of insecurity in the foundations of society that such men pledged to kill kings and rulers should be found plotting and organising themselves in all portions of the civilised world. No horror, no condemnation can be too strong for murder, so long as it does not lead to fright and cruelty and forgetfulness of the principles of free speech and free thought which is so precious a possession of our people. The Spectator for Sept. 14 dealt in an article with the causes of crimes. It referred to the blind lust for blood, and the longing for notoriety which tended to make murderers, but it did not speak clearly of what is one of the most certain causes of their existence. Political murderers are largely made by the oppression under which so many suffer in some of the countries of Europe: it drives ignorant, passionate, foolish men mad. I do not say it as excusing the criminal, but I do say that the power and tyranny of irresponsible rulers tend to create such crimes; they are not merely the result of human devilry or insanity. To-day the nations are knit so closely together that they suffer for each other's faults with certainty: the criminals created in one place bring forth their deadly fruit of hatred and murder in another. We are strong in each other's strength, and weak and in danger through each other's failures and sins. There must be something wrong in the Government and social condition of a country when such Anarchists are made. No Government will turn good right-thinking men into murderers of the innocent, but an oppressive Government will make ignorant, unbalanced, weak men commit actions of which under a wiser, freer rule they would have never dreamt.

The individual cannot be exonerated from responsibility for his crimes, but neither can nations be exonerated from the responsibility of producing criminals and especially political criminals. Such criminals have been sent out by certain continental nations over the face of the earth with murder in their hearts. It is time that we urged not only the wickedness of the crime but the national responsibility involved in such productions. Above all things let us beware lest we through fear or sympathy be involved in the methods by which such criminals are made.

And, lastly, the death of a man so prominent, so full of activity, so alive, hurried so swiftly from his great responsibilities and honours, fills us once again with the thought of the uncertainty of life, its insecurity, and makes us feel how near we are to death. Death is the most tremendous overwhelming fact we have to face; nothing is so absolutely certain to happen; nothing is more shrouded in mystery as to its nature and results. What is the right noble attitude towards this strange and awful fact? To a large extent we avoid thinking about it; we accept it as destiny, but we do not realise it, and we go on peacefully with our work and pleasure. That is a far healthier better mood than one of morbid fearful brooding on the thought of death. But, on the other hand, merely to ignore this most certain and wonderful of facts, is hardly satisfactory, hardly worthy of a man who ought to see things as they are. We do not find such a temper in the noblest men. Part of the strength of Dante, says Carlyle, lay in the fact that he had realised as few men do that he must die. He was not frightened by the knowledge and not depressed, but it gave a solemnity, an urgency, a power to life which without this thought it could not have attained. To the far-seeing brave man the thought of death is a call to more strenuous work, more vivid existence, more tender love.

We have so short a time on earth in which to do our work, to be kind to one another, to develope faculty and character, let us live to the uttermost and use every moment of it. Such a thought of death does not weaken, it startles and arouses us. As we think of death things take their due proportion: we see the things in life that really matter: we feel the worth of love, the call to duty, the infinite value of goodness.

Small irritations with each other, petty jealousies, mean ambitions, how they shrivel up at the thought of death! We feel the utter insignificance of them; the thought of death makes us see what real life is, what is important and worth while. Tenderness, self-conquest, earnest efforts to do right, painful striving, a little good achieved for the weak and sad and sinful—these and such as these are the things we feel worth while as we look at life from death; these are the things which make us thank God we have not lived utterly in vain. Whatever may happen in the unknown future, we knew beyond the shadow of a doubt the worth of love and goodness. That is the right influence of the thought of death upon a man. Seen without fear, without morbid imaginings, it corrects the perspective of ordinary life. It will make life more precious to us, it will make us gentler with each other, it will make us work more unselfishly and earnestly until the end.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

III.

The Norman Conquest.

To Englishmen nothing could take the place of our vernacular histories. Their loss is absolutely irreparable. No records in any other tongue, however full or accurate, could be to us so precious as the old native chronicles. Yet we must acknowledge that the Conquest brought some substantial compensation. The coming of the Normans was the last and greatest of the Danish invasions. The Normans were Danes over again, our kinsmen, kinsmen indeed returning to Teutonic soil, but civilised during a century and a-half on the Continent,—kinsmen speaking a foreign tongue but the most cultivated and religious people in Europe. And if the Conqueror dealt a death-blow at the literary work of Aelfred, he nevertheless revived that of Baeda, and lifted English scholarship, for the first time since Ealhwine, to a foremost place in Christendom.

Side by side in the cities rose up castle and minster, the centres of temporal and spiritual authority, round which gathered the varied elements of Anglo-Norman feudalism. Both had their literatures, at first severely apart, but later often indistinguishable. The cathedral churches and larger monasteries were nearly all rebuilt in the massive Norman manner, and learning and chronicle-writing advanced with architecture. Early in the twelfth century there were chroniclers of mark, already as much English as Norman, at Durham, Worcester, Canterbury, Lincoln, Peterborough and Malmesbury.

Simeon of Durham.

Simeon of Durham, who was a boy in the year of the battle of Senlac, took part as a young man in an effort to restore Baeda's monastery at Jarrow, when Northumbria, after the Conqueror's campaign and Scottish barbarities, was, as he tells us, still "a wilderness, and the villages between York and Durham were uninhabited, the lurking-places of wild beasts and robbers." After nine years the attempt was abandoned, and the brethren joined the monastery at Durham, which then became Simeon's home for almost half a century. He was probably about two and thirty when in 1092 he saw the old English cathedral pulled down to make way for the present grand building. As official chronicler he described the translation of St. Cuthbert's remains into the new minster in 1104, and later wrote a history of the see—Historia Dunelmensis Ecclesiae. Rebuilding of the cathedrals led to histories of the episcopates and valuable contributions to our knowledge of England before the Conquest. Simeon collected old Northumbrian annals, including a version of the Gesta Veterum Northanhymbrorum—which was written, perhaps, under the influence of Ealhwine—and wove them, with original matter, into his Historia Regum, a valuable authority on northern affairs from Baeda to the year 1129.

Two of his sources of information were writings by Florence of Worcester and Eadmer of Canterbury.

Florence of Worcester.

Florence was a pupil and an admirer of the English bishop Wulfstan, whom he used to see, after long watching and study, go to sleep on a bench in his church, with a book for his pillow. Let us associate Florence with the new minster at Worcester, as Simeon with that at Durham. The fine Norman crypt still exists where he used to perambulate with his famous master, and with his fellow-scholar Colman, the probable author of the Worcester English Chronicle and of the description in it, which I have referred to, of King William. Florence's Chronicon ex Chronicis is indebted to this and other English annals, and is as trustworthy as they are. Freeman, who said he took care never to contradict the English Chronicles even when he brought in information from other sources, ranked Florence's work only second to them. Like the English, and unlike the Norman historians, Florence hurries over Senlac as a very painful subject. He greatly admired Harold, while he respected the Conqueror; detested Rufus, but rather liked Henry I., whose English wife and English policy brought him favour among the people. Living on the Welsh border, he had special knowledge of British doings and ambitions both in the past and in his own time. He died in 1118.

Eadmer of Canterbury.

If Simeon and Florence were both probably English, Eadmer was certainly,—the son of Kentish parents, who sent him to the monastery school at Canterbury. Here in 1073 he saw the removal of Dunstan's body from the Old English cathedral, then in ruins, preparatory to the erection of Lanfranc's much larger church. He was a youth of about 15 when in 1079 he attracted the notice of Anselm on his visit to Canterbury. Fourteen years afterwards, in 1093, when Anselm was appointed archbishop in Lanfranc's stead, Eadmer became his chaplain and friend; and in 1097 he accompanied him in his exile, ravelling with him through France and Burgundy to Rome. He returned to Canterbury with his master, in 1100, and on his death, in 1109, made him the hero of his Historia Novorum in Anglia, which was published in its first form about 1112, but was revised, from time to time, until it was twice its original size in 1122. He also wrote, among other things, Vita Anselmi, and a supplement Quaedam Parva Descriptio Miraculorum Anselmi, which he finished when he was "old and grey-headed and his hand trembled." From boyhood he says, he had a habit of noting down events; and his carefulness is proved by his frequent revision. His Historia Novorum is our chief authority for the reign of Rufus. It has interest also for its departure from the annalistic style of Simeon and Florence, and its approach to the more historical method of his younger contemporaries Orderic, Henry of Huntingdon, and William of Malmesbury.

Orderic.

It is remarkable that Orderic, the son of a Norman, and a resident for more than fifty years in a Norman monastery in an age when Norman influence was at its greatest, should, on the score of his birth in England, proudly speak of himself as an Englishman. Even if his mother was English it would be inexplicable unless England had at least begun to feel that it was the head of the Norman world. His father was chaplain of the great Baron Roger de Montgomery, second-in-command at the battle of Senlac, and was the founder, with help from Roger, of the Norman Abbey of Shrewsbury. Orderic was baptised in 1075 at the little church of Attingham (Atcham), whose Norman tower still looks over the peaceful meadows of the Severn, three miles from Shrewsbury. When he was ten years old, his mother being dead, he was sent by his father, as an offering to God, to the Monastery of St. Evroult, at Ouche, in Normandy. He did not see his father again, but he remembered to the end of his life how they parted with tears; and he never forgot his native place. Shrewsbury plays a very important part in his history. At Ouche, like Joseph in Egypt, he yielded himself up patiently to his lot, and lived in the great monastery in the forest, as Baeda, his model, had lived in Jarrow, until he was old,—happy among his books, unambitious, and beloved by the brethren. He rarely left home; but in or near 1123, thirty-eight years after leaving it, he paid a visit to England, stayed five weeks at Crowland, and saw John of Worcester busy in his scriptorium on a continuation of Florence's Chronicon. His great book, on which he was occupied from about 1121 to 1141, and to which he gave, with less appropriateness than Baeda to his work, the title Historia Ecclesiastica, is even more formless than its prototype. It is a long, rambling, confused narrative, crammed with information of the most diversified character, from lives of saints and synodical decrees to Court amours, new fashions in wearing the hair, pointed shoes and influenza,—all of it of value to the student of culture, the vast accumulation of a curious, industrious, truthful mind. Normandy and England are treated as practically one. As we might expect of the son of a man who was probably in William's army at Senlac, he looks at Harold with Norman eyes; but his spirited account of the battle—he alone, by the bye, gives the name of the locality, which has been identified with Santlache, the Sandy-grove—is impartial. As his history proceeds, his sympathies, like those of the Normans in England, grow more and more English. He died in 1142, lamenting the capture of Stephen by "rebels." He took the King's side in the Civil War, and recorded his bravery at the battle of Lincoln.

Henry of Huntingdon.

The struggle between Stephen and the Empress was so largely personal and feudal that it can only in a very secondary sense be attributed to national antagonism. Yet as the elected and not hereditary sovereign, Stephen, on the whole, commanded the support of the English. Henry of Huntingdon and William of Malmesbury, both sons of Normans, but on other grounds besides parentage, if parentage was one, were his opponents. Henry, who was born and bred in the fenland, among the "pulcherrimae paludes" and "rustling beds of rushes," was placed by his father, the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, when a small boy, in the luxurious household of Robert Bloet, the Norman Bishop of Lincoln. On the famous hill above the Witham, overlooking then a wide expanse of water, in the shadow of Remy's new cathedral on the one hand and William's castle on the other, on opposite sides of the old Fosse Way, Henry grew to manhood, the companion of nobles, with a taste for poetry and history. He was about forty years of age when, in 1123, Bloet was succeeded by Alexander, the "Magnificent," of Blois, a generous patron of architecture and letters. It was Alexander who restored the cathedral, after a fire, in a more elaborate and expensive Norman style, "so that," as Henry says, "it appeared more beautiful than when it was first built, and was surpassed by none in all England," and who encouraged Henry to write his Historia Anglorum. This was first published in 1130, enlarged in 1135, and again revised in 1139, when rough treatment of his friend Bishop Alexander caused him to speak in strong language of the king. He lived on into the reign of Henry II., whom he welcomed to the throne in his last edition of the Historia in 1154 or 1155. He is an artistic, if rather careless writer, with sense of form in the arrangement of his materials and feeling for the picturesque. Something of a poet himself, he has embodied in his Latin prose numerous old sagas and legends which have otherwise disappeared. He alone is responsible for the fine stories of Cnut's rebuke of his thanes on the shore at Southampton, and of the death of the son of Siward which Shakespeare immortalised in Macbeth. He gives us, as we might expect, the best descriptions of the battle of Lincoln, in 1141. One of his last additions is an account of Stephen's siege of Malmesbury Castle, and his repulse by storm and flood, in 1152, when his brother historian of this place was no longer living to record it.

William of Malmesbury.

William of Malmesbury was about twelve years younger than Henry of Huntingdon, and he died some twelve years before him—his life probably being shortened by excessive study. From a schoolboy he loved and devoured books, became a good Latinist, and was appointed librarian of the monastery in 1125, when his age was perhaps thirty and he was already author, as he himself justly claimed, of the best history of England since Baeda. His Gesta Regum Anglorum is an admirable book, both in matter and form, the nearest approach we have yet had to a history, as distinguished from a mere chronicle. William, like Baeda, used his materials instead of merely annexing them after the manner of the chroniclers; but he also wrote with a sense of the order and connection of events quite beyond Baeda. It is a young man's book, English rather than Norman in sympathy—far more English than Henry of Huntingdon's Historia Anglorum—with a young man's outspokenness on men in high places. Later, after contact, through friendship with the Earl of Gloucester, with magnates in Church and Court, he modified his judgments and toned down his expressions without always improving them. He writes as a Wessex man, devoted to the memory of Ealdhelm and Dunstan, does justice, for the first time in English history, to Aethelstan, reports legends, not yet associated with "King Arthur," of the Vale of Avalon, and tells stories, mostly from ballads, of the loves of King Eadgar, Gunhild's ordeal, and the witch of Berkeley. His brief character-sketches are worthy of Baeda, but he has a humour and sprightliness foreign to the Old Englishman. He preserves the saying, attributed to Henry Beauclerc, "Rex illiteratus, asinus coronatus"; and he hits at the fanaticism of crusaders, and some national weaknesses in the famous gibe, that for the sake of the Cross "the Welshman even left his woods and hounds, the Scot his fellowship with fleas, the Dane his deep draughts, and the Norseman his feasts of dried fish." Toward the end of his busy life, when his monastery had been rebuilt, or was being rebuilt, in the later Norman style—whose characteristic feature of fine-jointed masonry did not escape his observation—and a castle, one of the first of the Bishops' castles, had either risen, or was rising, by its side, William wrote his Historia Novella, a sketch of contemporary English history from 1126 to the year of his death, 1143. Let us connect this book with the massive Norman ruins which still crown the ancient Meldum's dune. It is dedicated to Earl Robert of Gloucester, the half-brother of the Empress Maud, and her chief supporter in the war with Stephen; and, to all intents, it is an apologia for him and his party. It should be read with the Gesta Stephani, a record of the war on the other side by one of the King's chaplains. Both are books of battles, indispensable to the student of castle warfare, accounts as by special correspondents in the opposite camps, of marches, sieges, fortifications, desperate hand-to-hand encounters, ramming and undermining, captures, councils, and escapes. We see the first straining of feudalism in England, the striving with one another of its three orders—the crown, the baronage, and the church; the effort of the cities, in this striving, to seize new liberties; and the dull, silent suffering of the mass of the English folk, who were incapable of understanding what was going on among their Latin and French-speaking betters. One voice alone is heard in English, that of the monk at Peterborough, who says in his Chronicle under the year 1137:—

When Stephen the King came to England (from Normandy) he maked his gathering at Oxford. And there he seized Bishop Roger of Salisbury (the builder of the new monastery and the private castle at Malmesbury), and Bishop Alexander of Lincoln (Henry of Huntingdon's patron) and Roger the Chancellor, his nephew, and did them all into prison until they gave up their castles. Then the traitors (there is no doubt on which side the English chronicler was) understood that he was a mild man, and soft, and good, and did not enforce justice . . . and they kept no faith. Every rich man maked his castle and held it against him. And they filled the land with castles, and wore out wretched men of the land with castle-work, and then they filled the castles with devils and evil men . . . who hung up some by the feet and smoked them . . . others by the thumbs, or by the head, or hung burning things on their feet. They did knotted strings about their head and twisted them until they went into the brain. They did them in quarters where were adders and snakes and toads, until they dropped.

And he goes on:—

Then was corn dear, and flesh, and cheese, and butter, for there was none in the land; wretched men starved with hunger, some lived on alms who were erstwhile rich; some fled out of the land. Never was there more wretchedness, and never did heathen men worse. . . . The earth bore no corn, for the land was all undone by such deeds. And they said openly that Christ and his hallowed ones slept.

In such a time chronicling at last came to an end, English and Latin. The last years of Stephen and the first of Henry II. have no contemporary record. For more than fifteen years there is a gap in our history, bridged only by men who lived later.

AS THE LIGHTNING.

THOUGH more noticeable, most frequently depicted and often considered typical, forked, chain, or linear lightning is comparatively rare. The ordinary lightning, which attracts very little observation, which is scarcely ever described, and is generally forgotten when imagination depicts a storm, is continually in evidence; harmless and common the "sheet" lightning visits every district but compels no poet's song nor is immortalised by artist's skill.

Which kind was in the mind of the author of these words:—"For as the lightning cometh forth from the east and is seen even unto the west, so shall be the coming of the Son of Man"? The description would be true of either, though the general impression is that linear lightning more often appears to flow downward from the skies to the earth, than to dart along parallel with the horizon. No one knows which he meant, just as no one knows exactly what he meant.

Here is a meaning for us. Let the "Son of Man" stand, as it did stand once, for true manhood as distinguished from beasthood; how shall that Son of Man come on the earth? Like the summer lightning it shall flash out, east, west, the whole world over. The parable is to our hand. Never in one quarter only are those blue sheets of flame waved before us, the lightning has no local home. On a summer's eve the stillness of the air is broken by our cry as we watch the distant hill lit up in mild effulgence; waiting to see the sight again the river reflects for us the flash that has descended as a golden curtain behind our back; in a moment, on our right, the mantle of night seems torn away that the azure of some mysterious dawn may startle our eyes; on every hand its delightful splendours glorify the hour, until it would seem that its springs as well from beneath our feet. Just so comes the true Son of Man. Not here, nor there, but in every place, manifesting itself in each hemisphere, in every terrestrial quarter; a presence (παρουσια) appearing simultaneously at all points, not exactly a wave, but rather a movement.

Have you watched water freeze? You cannot say exactly where the process begins, where the ice first shows its presence; the feathery spicules dart from this side and from that; pieces in the centre stretch out to meet those springing from the sides—from the east even unto the west. So is the coming of humanity, the arrival of the Son of Man, the establishment of the kingdom of God. Parallel experiences abound in other domains. The latest findings of science seem to assure us that the first appearance of life on this globe was not limited to one spot; it is almost certainly established that man himself similarly arrived, not as was by the earlier thinkers supposed in one chosen garden of Eden, but when the time was ripe, simultaneously appearing in various quarters of the globe. The story of the great inventions and discoveries, when told by those who have no desire to claim honour for one land or person above another, gives illustration after illustration of this coincident arriving. Great theories too have a singular way of being born in different minds almost at the same hour. The student of such movements as the Reformation, the Renaissance, or the various political and social reforms, knows that in all these it is impossible to say "Lo here," "lo there," and put one's finger exactly on the spot or the man; out flashes the thought, on the right and on the left. The thing, we say in our rough but poetic speech, the thing was "in the air." Yes, like the lightning, abounding on every side. "Movements" indeed are in the air, that is to say east and west manifest the same unrest, the same hopes flash across different horizons; noble lips in India are saying what the reformers on the other side of the globe are whispering to each other. As the lightning so cometh the Son of Man.

It was so in Jesus' day. Others like-minded with himself were searching the deeps of their hearts, having learned to look there first of all for enduring truths; other skies than those of Palestine were catching echoes of the words "God—the father," "Man—the loving child." In scattered parts hearts like his own were seeking, not unsuccessfully, for the great realities amidst all the shams of life. The "Son of Man" had come indeed in many hearts; well did he say the kingdom had already begun in their midst. Nor was that coming a mere flash; the Christ of Galilee left his mark, although Christians who succeeded him tried hard to efface it; Roman philosopher and Indian sage each in some degree brought nearer the kingdom of God.

To-day also the heavens of daily life are full of manifestations of the coming of the Son of Man, whose manliness shall overcome for ever the brute "dreadful and mighty." Not here is the one only deliverer, not there the new saint in whose teaching alone salvation will be found. East and west, north and south, disconnected, isolated, as seen by us, but united and part of one movement from God's standpoint—there flash out the divine fires. Signs of our times are as significant as any signs ever were. Let us recognise them. A handful of truthful men in different lands who love art too well ever to lie for her; a poet now and then who sings of the eternal beauty and truth even when men prefer the screechings that praise their vices; a prophet who speaks of peace to a nation drunk with the blood of its enemies; a few men and women, scattered throughout the world, who scorn wealth and fame so that they may be indeed wealthy and honourable; a martyr, one amidst a million comfortable people; a saint unnoticed in the cityful of "respectable" people; a faithful voice in a great darkness; thus they come, not with the world's observation, they are too far apart for that; their day, their hour no man can define, nevertheless they build up the kingdom.

The Messiah may never come, but the Son of Man arrives from day to day. The Kingdom of Heaven is already on the ar th; its fulness grows nearer with Every grain of sand that runs,

And every span of shade that steals,
And every kiss of toothed wheels
And all the courses of the suns.

Arthur Harvie.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 16 and 17, the 248th annual gathering of members and friends of the churches connected with the General Baptist Assembly took place at Adrian-street Church, Dover.

The meetings opened on Monday with a gathering, at which the Rev. S. Burrows gave a hearty welcome to the members of the Assembly to Dover.

The Rev. Harvey Smith (Bethnal Green) acknowledged the welcome, and proceeded to deliver the presidential address, in the course of which, having dwelt on the history and principles of their Assembly, he said:—

What they wanted was not only their noble ancestry, their antiquity, freedom in church life, church government, but there was before them a great want of power for service. Some people would say, "You never will get that power till you change your creed. You have made a mistake; you have cast off the creed that is allied with power, and taken on a creed always powerless for the great service of humanity." He ventured to think there was sometimes a mistaken thought as to what is the power that is wanted. The great power, he thought, that was needed, and which they lacked so much, was the power of persuasion. They had turned away from the power of fear and had said they could not endure it. They could not go back to it, and would have nothing to do with it.

What was the good of a gospel of love, what is the good of all that springs from that gospel of love, unless that power which deeply feels for the human heart speaks that word, and carries it home heart and soul.

To be possessed of emotion, he thought, was a great want of their Assembly. And his heart's desire and prayer was that he and his brethren might get at the source of this power; that they might get their hearts and minds filled with it; that they might persuade men to forsake the evils and wickedness which happen in human life; persuade men to be true citizens, true fathers and brothers—power to draw men away from the things that are mere trifles to those that were worthy of their humanity, of the God who made us and whose high purposes are telling us that we might have power to persuade men to come in and fill the sanctuaries.

At the conclusion of the Presidential Address, Communion Service was conducted by the Rev. T. Bond (Portsmouth).

The Assembly continued its sittings on Tuesday morning under the presidency of the Rev. Harvey Smith.

The Rev. J. Wain was unanimously elected to the office of Vice-President. The Rev. A. J. Marchant was re-elected Treasurer, and the Rev. C. Hoddinott was re-elected Secretary. Letters were read from the various churches connected with the Assembly.

The Chairman said that he thanked God for the noble work for true religion that was evidently being done by the small churches and their pastors.

On the motion of Councillor Ben, seconded by Mr. W. Fenn, a resolution of profound sympathy with the family of the late President McKinley and the American nation was unanimously passed.

In the evening a service was held in the Adrian-street Church. The Rev. G. Lansdown (Billingshurst) conducted the devotional part of the service, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. E. P. Hall, B.A., who said that he profoundly believed that there was an important work for these smaller churches to perform. There were two great events in the history of modern Europe—the break up of the Roman Empire and the break up of the Roman Church, from which events arose the smaller nations and the various denominations of Christendom. These events inaugurated the reign of individualism. Its tide was now nearly spent, and the oncoming tide was of a very different character. It brought with it community instead of individuality; Catholicism instead of sect life. But after all the smaller nations and sects were doing a noble work in the world, and it took the whole Church to preach the whole Gospel. Browning's poem, "The Boy and the Angel," showed that to the ear of the Almighty the absence of one small voice marred the universal harmony. God grant that He might not, through the indifference and disloyalty of those who belonged to the smaller churches, miss one note that was needful to perfect the choral strain whose music is the rapture of the spheres.

The following tribute to the late Evelyn Abbott, joint-author with Professor Lewis Campbell of the "Life of Jowett," and for many years a hard-working tutor at Balliol, was sent by a correspondent to last week's Spectator:—

"English scholarship and the teaching of classical antiquity at Oxford have experienced a very distinct loss in the death of Dr. Evelyn Abbott. But even more than a public loss is it a personal bereavement to his College and his many friends. Balliol has had during the last thirty years, as she had in the thirty years before, the services of many able and devoted sons. Her success has been due quite as much to their chivalrous and selfless devotion as to their high ability. Henry Smith, T. H. Green, Arnold Toynbee, R. D. Nettleship, Sir John Conroy—these have been among Jowett's chief henchmen, and ably they seconded him. But none was more devoted or faithful to the College than the brave, diligent student and tutor who served her so long from what might have seemed, in Heine's phrase, a 'mattress grave.' A fine athlete in his undergraduate days, as well as a scholar, unaccountably paralysed in his lower limbs just as he took his degree, and reduced literally to the condition of Browning's grammarian, Abbott, like Fawcett, seems to have resolved that 'it should make no difference.' Dr. Percival at Clifton and Mr. Jowett at Balliol gave him the opportunity; he lived his life, he made a name as a scholar, he read, he wrote, he taught, he examined, he was the genial friend and helper of many generations of undergraduates, who will remember him all over the Empire. Above all, he taught one lesson, learned in the hardest school, leiden ohne zu klagen (to suffer without complaining). Such men do more than they know, and their pupils feel for them more than they can express."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—On Sunday last a congregational meeting was held, when it was unanimously decided to perpetuate the memory of the late Mr. E. Mills, who had been President of the Church and Chairman of Committee since its foundation, by erecting a suitable memorial tablet in the church. A series of week-night lectures with the view to stimulating interest in our cause in Accrington are being arranged.

Atherton: Chowbent Chapel.—On the completion of a twenty-five years' ministry in the Unitarian body, the Rev. J. J. Wright, on Sunday morning last, gave a brief review of the changes which had taken place during that period in the thought, method, life and outlook of the denomination, and, to some extent, in other religious bodies. The evening sermon was specially devoted to the death of President McKinley. On Monday evening, in the schoolroom, the Guild, which has upwards of 100 members over fifteen years of age, re-opened its regular meetings, with a full attendance of earnest young people. "To live the life" and "to lend a hand" has been the motto of this Guild for years, and the feeling of association with the recently-formed "Guilds' Union" seems to have given it added vigour. For nearly all present on Monday evening "something to do" was found in the many and various institutions connected with school or chapel. The leader never knew the young people more ready with suggestions or willingness to "do something." Moreover, they were eager themselves to talk, and listen with interest to one another, upon things of the better life. The leader asked for a quiet resolve in the heart of each present, as in the sight of God, to faithfully attend Divine service at least once every Sunday.

Carlisle.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when sermons were preached morning and evening by the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., who was present as a representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The services were well attended, the congregation at night being unusually large. The special music included solos by Miss Armytage, of Newcastle, and Mr. Hanna, and anthems by the choir. On the Monday evening the annual tea was held in the schoolroom, about 140 sitting down to it. After tea a public meeting was held in the church, when there was a good attendance, including fifteen members of the Newcastle Church, some being a deputation from the Northumberland and Durham Association. The chair was taken by Mr. James Arlosh, J.P., of Woodside, Carlisle, and he was supported by the Rev. C. Travers (Carlisle) and Rev. James Harwood; Mr. Alderman Barker Ellis, President of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association; Mr. Councillor Affleck, Gateshead; Messrs. C. Slater, Coysh, Errington, Donald (of Newcastle), T. Paxton (of South Shields); and Messrs. Marchington and Dixon (of Carlisle). The Chairman, in his opening address, referred to the death of Mr. McKinley, and moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting has heard with grief of the death of President McKinley at the hands of an assassin, and declares its horror and detestation of the crime. It desires to express its profound sympathy with the American people in their great loss, and with Mrs. McKinley in her grievous affliction." The resolution was carried by the whole of those present standing in their places. After a solo by Miss Armytage, the Chairman congratulated the congregation on the progress of the church during the eight years of Mr. Travers' ministry, the anniversary of whose induction they also celebrated that day. Their church at Carlisle occupied an isolated position, their nearest neighbour being Newcastle, sixty miles away; but notwithstanding this and the fact that they were planted in the midst of an ecclesiastical preserve, Mr. Travers had steered their barque with great skill and courage, and they might fairly take a good deal of credit to themselves that they were able to muster such gatherings as they had had this anniversary. Mr. Alderman Ellis and the Rev. James Harwood delivered very effective speeches, and the minister having expressed the pleasure they felt in having Mr. Harwood and the friends from Newcastle with them, the meeting closed with hymn and Benediction. A letter from the Earl of Carlisle regretting his inability to be present, and hoping that there might be a useful gathering, was received.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual aggregate service of the Union was held at Stratford on Sunday, Sept. 15, at 3.15 P.M., conducted by Mr. T. Elliot, of Highgate. About 160 scholars and teachers were present, representing the schools of Mansford-street, Stepney, Forest Gate, and Stratford. The hymns were sung very heartily, and the impressive address given by Mr. Elliot on "Truth" was listened to with great attention.

London: Islington.—On Sunday last, in the absence of the Rev. Dr. Hicks, the pulpit of Unity Church was occupied by Mr. E. Capleton, who concluded an impressive address on "Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him?" with a touching reference to the tragic death of President McKinley, and to our profound sympathy with the American nation in their great loss. "Nearer, my God, to thee," was sung as the final hymn, and Mr. Brittan, the organist, played Mendelssohn's "Funeral March" at the conclusion of the service, the congregation standing meanwhile.

Manchester: Longsight (Appointment).—Mr. H. J. Rossington, B.A., has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of this church. He will enter upon his duties on the first Sunday in October, the occasion of the Harvest Festival. The induction service will take place on Saturday, Oct. 19, as to which further particulars will be announced.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—The fourth and last conference of the year was held at Accrington on Sept. 14. After tea the Rev. Arthur W. Fox (Todmorden), President, took the chair, and Miss M. J. Dearden (of Newchurch) read a paper on "The Training of the Young in Sunday Schools." In her remarks, which had reference chiefly to children from the age of four or six to eight, she laid stress on the necessity of a knowledge of child-nature, and mentioned that observation and imitation were two of the most characteristic traits. That teachers should be living examples of what they aimed at making the child was also insisted upon. Several speakers followed in praise of the paper, and many useful hints were added. Two musical items were given by Miss Mackie and Mrs. Hargreaves during the evening, and the most successful meeting held for two or three years was closed with the Benediction.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Saturdry, Sept. 7, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Wright entertained the scholars, teachers, and friends of the school at their farm in Eaglescliffe; and on Sept. 12, Mr. J. A. Robinson, organist of the church, took the choir to Castleton for a delightful day on the moors.

Stourbridge (Farewell Presentation).—The Rev. A. W. Timmis having resigned the pulpit of the Presbyterian Chapel on his acceptance of the post of minister to the Poor at the Renshaw-street Mission in Manchester, the Stourbridge congregation have marked their appreciation of his services during nearly eighteen years by a farewell presentation. On Thursday week a gathering of the members of the congregation and other friends took place in the grounds of Mr. A. W. Worthington's house at Old Swinford, among those present being Mr. and Mrs. Worthington, Mr. and Mrs. T. Grosvenor Lee, the Revs. A. W. Timmis, I. Wrigley, and A. H. Shelley. The gifts consisted of a handsome clock, a fine reproduction of the old Chippendale style, a silver tea service, and a purse of £50. Mr. Worthington, in making the presentation to Mr. Timmis on behalf of the congregation, spoke of the ties of goodwill, respect, and affection which during many years had united both Mr. and Mrs. Timmis to them, and of the many opportunities which the ministerial life afforded for the forming of such ties. The good-will of the congregation would follow Mr. and Mrs. Timmis to their new home, where they would have a visible memorial of it in that clock. He saw on a sun-dial the other day the words, "I count the sunny hours." He trusted that the clock would remind Mr. Timmis of the many happy hours he had spent in Stourbridge. Mr. Timmis, in reply, said that he felt quite unable adequately to express what he felt at that moment, deeply moved as he had been by Mr. Worthington's address. He could do very little more than thank from the bottom of his heart their friends for the very great kindness expressed towards them. He was going to Manchester with the hope that he would be able to do some good there. A minister did not live and exert an influence if he did not live to do good. No one could be more conscious than himself of his many faults and failings, but he did hope to do a little good before he died. He hoped that the congregation would flourish in time to come as he had never seen it flourish, and he should always be glad to hear of the welfare of his friends at Stourbridge. Mrs. Blurton then presented the tea service to Mrs. Timmis, saying that she did so, in the regretted absence of Miss Evers, through indisposition, and Mrs. Timmis having gratefully acknowledged the gift, the proceedings terminated, and the rest of the evening was pleasantly spent in social intercourse.

"We sympathise to a great extent with the author's dissatisfaction with formal philosophy and conventional religion, and agree that Stoicism properly understood offers a better refuge for the human mind. Mr. Walker's philosophy is not pure stoicism, as it is modified by Christian Theism, and the combination is productive of a cheerful optimism. The author says many sensible things. The book ought to be popular, and we wish it success."—WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

DURING the autumn the efforts of the special committee of the National Conference in furtherance of the Ministers' Superannuation Fund are to be vigorously carried on, in the hope that the whole of the £20,000 asked for, to secure the establishment of the Fund, may be raised before the end of the year. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, Chairman of the Committee and President of the National Conference, is to attend a series of meetings, when he and other speakers will urge the claims of the Fund. Meetings have been arranged for the following dates:—Birmingham, Oct. 1; Leicester, Oct. 3; Liverpool, Oct. 8; Belfast, Oct. 18; Leeds, in connection with the autumn meeting of the B. and F.U.A., Oct. 22; Sheffield, Oct. 24; Newcastle, Nov. 8. During November Mr. Carpenter will be lecturing in the University cities of Scotland, and it is hoped that a further meeting may be held at Glasgow on Nov. 25, in connection with the annual meeting of the Scottish Unitarian Association.

THE report of the annual meeting of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, held on Tuesday at Mansfield, has not reached us in time for this week's issue. The bicentenary of the Old Meeting at Mansfield, celebrated on Tuesday and Wednesday, we also hope to report fully next week. A booklet issued in connection with these meetings gives some interesting historical notes from the early days of peaceable Nonconformity in Mansfield, when the vicar was friendly and the place, not coming under the Five Mile Act, was a refuge for several ejected ministers. The Bicentenary Commemoration Service was held on Wednesday morning, followed by a conference, at which the Rev. J. E. Carpenter is announced as speaking on "The Religious Movement which led to the Founding of the Old Meeting House," the Rev. E. I. Fripp, the present minister, on "The History of the Old Meeting," and Mr. A. W. Worthington and Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, former ministers, on "Personal Reminiscences." At the public meeting in the evening the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow and Joseph Wood were to be among the speakers.

FRIDAY of last week was the great day of the Alfred Commemoration at Winchester. A picturesque procession of notables, civic, ecclesiastical, military, and academic, passed along the streets of the venerable city to the Broadway, where Lord Rosebery unveiled Mr. Hamo Thorneycroft's fine statue of the King. The statue is in bronze, and shows Alfred holding aloft his sheathed sword, grasped beneath the hilt, which this appears as emblem of the cross. On the arrival of the procession prayers were read by the Bishop of Winchester, and a "Chorus of Praise" was sung by the united choirs of Chichester, Salisbury, and Winchester Cathedrals and St. George's Chapel, Windsor. The following special prayer was among those used :—

O Lord, by Whom alone Kings reign and Princes decree justice, Who providest for Thy people with tenderness and rulest over them in love, we give thanks to Thee this day for the life of Thy servant Alfred our King. A thousand years in Thy sight are but as yesterday, seeing that is passed as a watch in the night. We thank Thee for the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of council and strength, which Thou gavest to him, and for the fruit which hath followed in many lands from his labours in Thy faith and fear; and humbly we beseech Thee to grant that we, well using to Thy glory these Thy gifts, may be profitable members of the Church and commonwealth, and that our people may continue to do Thee service to the end of time; and that finally with all the dead in Christ we may be brought into the immortal glory of the Resurrection through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Lord Rosebery's speech was an eloquent eulogy of the King as an ideal Englishman, a perfect sovereign, and the pioneer of England's greatness. Having spoken of Alfred's devotion to duty and his indomitable courage (we quote from the Times' report), Lord Rosebery added:—"He had the supreme quality of truth, frankness, candour, an open heart. His word was his bond. That is a quality which was then rare among princes, and is never too common; but it is one which Englishmen love. He was known as the Truth-teller. It is a noble title, more distinguished than the vapid and prostituted epithet of Great. In history he stands as Alfred the truth-teller. Then he was a man, a complete man. What strikes one most in him, indeed, is his completeness. Complete is, I think, his distinctive epithet. Though profoundly pious, he was no anchorite. Though a King, not a pompous and mysterious phantom. Though a passionate seeker after knowledge, not a pedant or a prig. He lived as a man among men, for he was 'all things to all men' in the best sense of the word; rejoicing in the society of his scholars, his priests, his huntsmen, his craftsmen, his farmers; interested in all worthy interests, mixing freely with his subjects, working and playing among them, but with a little scroll of high thoughts always in his bosom. A man among men, dealing all day with the common affairs of life, but with the high ideal burning at his heart." In the afternoon a special service was held in the cathedral, when the Archbishop of Canterbury preached, and among the prayers used was the following collect:—

Almighty God, Who art the strength of all them that love and trust in Thee, we give unto Thee most high praise and hearty thanks for the wonderful grace manifested in Thy Saints from the beginning of the world. And here at this time we desire to have in thankful remembrance him whom Thou didst raise up in ages past to be a singular pattern of Christian wisdom and virtue in our land, Alfred, the righteous ruler, the valiant defender, the wise instructor of his people; the builder up of a great nation. Grant, we beseech Thee, that we all, and especially those who bear rule and authority amongst us, may after his example ever strive with singleness of heart "to live worthily," and in our vocation and ministry truly and godly to serve Thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE services at Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, last Sunday, were devoted to the commemoration of King Alfred, the sermons being preached by the Rev. Dr. de Beaumont Klein. In the morning sermon, which was based on 1 Chron. xvii. 8, Dr. Klein spoke of Alfred as having rolled back the tide of invasion, and brought about the awakening of the national consciousness, and laid the foundation of the unity, power, and greatness of the various racial elements that go to form the people of this realm. Of the King's character, the preacher spoke (as reported in the Daily Post) as follows:—

"Whether it be in the hour of triumph or in the hour of darkness, a divine spirit of goodness, moderation, liberality, and wisdom was ever with him. Of Alfred as a soldier much has been said and written. His ultimate success in the field was, no doubt, due to superior military qualities, in no small degree, perhaps representing his power to learn from experience. . . . His action showed a man, above all, gifted with tenacity of purpose, united to vivid political imagination, and true political wisdom. . . . Elated by success, a weaker man might have been tempted to show himself truculent and revengeful, but Alfred rose superior to such feelings in the consciousness of his duty as a ruler. He wisely saw that the problem before him was not how to get his revenge for all he had suffered in the past, but how to make it possible for the two races to live together in the land. Thus, instead of having recourse to wholesale executions of prisoners, as Charlemagne had done, in pursuance of a policy only too frequently practised in those times—instead of imposing upon the defeated Danes hard and exasperating conditions, Alfred astonished them all by his generosity and moderation, and thus completed their subjection more safely and more permanently than could have been done by excessive severity. In this way, Alfred appeared not merely as the saintly King of the West Saxons, but as the founder of the larger nation, rich by the variety of its racial elements, which had grown into a world-wide empire. Alfred stood almost alone among the rulers of nations for purity of character and aims joined to political insight."

REFERRING to recent discussions in Calcutta, in which a member of the Arya Samaj had violently attacked Christianity, and among replies from the orthodox side had been one from the Calcutta Missionary Conference, complaining of the bitter and unreasonable spirit of the attack and the "coarse vindictive hostility" of the Arya-Samaj towards Christianity, the Indian Messenger, while considering the original attack undeserving of serious notice, draws the following useful moral:—

We have often noticed with pain and shame what may be called "bitter and unreasonable hostility" towards other religions in the Arya Samaj. This might be due to their failure to appreciate them as well as a deliberate unwillingness to understand. We are constrained to say sorrowfully that the Christian missionaries themselves are accused, and sometimes not unjustly, of the same shortcoming. It is substantially true that after a long contact with the Hindus and Mahammadans they fail to form anything like a just estimate of these ancient religious systems. The Christian missionary representations of the Indian religions and social life are proverbially known to be unjust, inaccurate, and depreciatory. The fact is that the Christian missionaries fail to appreciate Indian religions as much as the Arya Samaj err, either consciously or unconsciously, in its estimate of Christianity. Both the parties are exclusive and will not acknowledge the merits of the other. The Brahmo Samaj stands between them with its eyes equally directed to the East and West. Our reverence for the ancient store of Indian wisdom, for its hereditary spirit of religiousness, its wealth of spiritual possessions has not blinded us to the sublime beauty of the life and teachings of Christ and the indispensable message of the West. We shall not depreciate the Gospels in order to extol the Upanishads. The spirit of God was equally at work among the ancient Jews and Greeks as among the Hindus. The Brahmo Samaj looks upon humanity as one family every member of which is equally dear to the Father Almighty. The spirit of broad humanity, a true catholicity, ought to be an essential characteristic of religion.

IN connection with the Jubilee of Owens College, Manchester, which was opened in March, 1851, a new Professorship of English Literature has been founded, and it was with the utmost satisfaction that we heard of the appointment of Professor C. H. Herford, Litt.D., of Aberystwyth, to the post. Mr. Herford, as many of our readers will be aware, is a native of Manchester, being the eldest son of the late Charles Herford, and grandson of the Rev. J. G. Robberds, for so many years minister of Cross-street Chapel. He had a distinguished career at Cambridge, and among his publications are "Studies in the Literary Relations of England and Germany in the Sixteenth Century," "The Age of Wordsworth," a translation of Ibsen's "Brand" in the original metres, and the "Eversley" edition of Shakespeare, with introductions and notes, in ten volumes. The College session opens next Tuesday, and on Thursday evening, Oct. 3, Professor Herford is to deliver an inaugural lecture on "The Permanent Power of English Poetry."

IN the October Mill Hill Pulpit the Rev. C. Hargrove publishes his sermon on "The Anarchist Peril: Its Cause and its Cure," of which we gave a brief report last week. We may be allowed here to add some of the closing sentences:—

There is one only Panacea for all our ills. It is not Anarchy, in which all the good would perish and the evil only survive. It is not Socialism, which would reduce all to a common level and make an end of excellence. It is not even Charity, though it will go far to alleviate misery it cannot remove. It is Justice, the Righteousness of God. When that is established as the law of the world all will be well, and not till then.

. . . . .

"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," said Jesus. It comes not with the march of armies, or the proclamations of republics. "It is within." In the hearts of men must it be first established, and spread from heart to heart, till it pervade the world. And if we really desire that for which we all pray, that the kingdom of God may come, then in our own hearts shall we strive to plant it and there tread down the envy, hatred, malice and all uncharitableness which are begotten of hell, and have their ultimate outcome in such crimes as that at which all the world now shudders.

THE new building of the Moss Side Unitarian Free Church in Manchester is now complete, and is to be opened next Saturday, Oct. 5. The service of dedication will be conducted by the Rev. C. Roper, minister of the church, the preacher being the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. During October the special Sunday preachers will be the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. Page Hopps, W. Copeland Bowie, and Frank Walters. Collections are to be taken for the Furnishing and Church Funds, for though the new building, which has cost £6,000, is paid for, an organ, a pulpit, and new hymn-books are still lacking, and the congregation, who do not believe in debt, are aiming to raise £1,000 more, to complete their equipment. The church as pictured in the programme of announcements looks extremely well.

"MY OLD VILLAGE."

LINES embodying some thoughts in Richard Jefferies' essay of that name.

"The happiest days become the saddest afterwards. Let us never go back, lest we too die."

My childhood owned a world of spaces wide
And deep green grass,
Where safely baby feet might pass
By trodden paths across the countryside.

I cannot find those paths of long ago,
That led to nooks
Beside the little singing brooks,
Where wild things dwelt and flowers were wont to grow.

So low the brake that held me safe embowered,
So small was I,
Against the azure vault on high
Like battlemented walls the hedgerows towered.

I see them now reduced to pigmy size.
Their verdant height,
That palace hall of birds' delight,
Existed not save to my childish eyes.

There was an old man I from earliest days
Had known and loved,
Who from those pastures never roved,
But seemed inwoven with our village ways;

And now I do not meet him in his place,
Yet scarce believe
The news of death I soon receive,
For life looks not the same without his face.

Home-loving one, seek not thy childhood's sky.
The happiest years
Become the saddest seen through tears;
Therefore return not, lest thou too shouldst die.

They say my kingdom was not but in dreams.
Ah, far more true
Than any world my manhood knew
That boundless realm of stream and meadow seems.

Some day, perchance, beyond the shining spheres,
Our souls may rise
To larger aims in nobler guise,
And walk in strength renewed as angels' peers.

Will smiling comrades doubt our place of birth,
And calmly say
In that far-off celestial day
That wisdom shows there never was an earth?

WE have received the September number of the British Sanitarian, but regret to see that owing to indisposition Dr. Lawson Dodd has not been able to complete the second of his series of articles on "The Housing Problem," which was commenced in the first number of this new journal. Mr. Ebenezer Howard contributes a second article on "Garden Cities," which includes notes on railway facilities and cheap sites.

LITERATURE.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.*

IT has been our privilege since Whitsuntide to publish in these columns the greater part of the proceedings of the International Council, but with the pleasant knowledge that the whole rich store would afterwards be gathered up in a volume, as a permanent and most valuable record of an occasion without parallel in the history of the Liberal movement in religion. That volume is now issued, and Mr. Copeland Bowie, the editor, is to be congratulated on the form it has taken. An octavo, in good readable type, wonderfully light to handle, the book should receive a very cordial welcome from all friends of Liberal religious thought and life; and we trust there will not be one of our Free Churches in which it will not be placed within the reach of all thoughtful readers.

Looking down the table of contents we are again impressed by the great variety and interest of the papers contributed, and are once more vividly reminded of that deeper unity of spirit which pervaded the whole proceedings, and was so great a stimulus and delight to the friends gathered together from many lands, but pledged to the one great cause. This is emphasised by Mr. Bowie in his Preface, who, while admitting that "Clericalism" is still a potent force in the civilised world, and that Liberalism occupies only a small space when compared with the organised hosts of "Orthodoxy," yet finds good reason for encouragement and hope, and looks forward to the time when the old confessional restrictions will fall away of themselves before a general acknowledgment of the permanent truths of spiritual religion. One regret expressed in the Preface will be very widely felt.

It is to be regretted that Mrs. Humphry Ward, much to her own sorrow, was prevented through illness from preparing her paper on "The Preservation of the Christian Ideal amid Changing Forms of Thought," for she, on more than one occasion, has borne eloquent testimony to the power of religion over the life of men who unhesitatingly welcome the full light of modern science and criticism.

It is also noted that papers on the Liberal movement in India and Japan did not reach England in time for inclusion in the volume. But there are not less than twenty papers, together with the President's address, Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon, an account of the Welcome to Foreign Delegates by the Rev. J. Harwood and the various responses, and the Report of the General Secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendté; it is pleasant also to find that our "Chronicle of the Week" has been of service in helping to furnish a "Record of the Proceedings." We would specially note that the papers by Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, on "The Religious Crisis of our Age," the Rev. Ernest Fontanés, of Paris, on "The Contribution of France to Religious Progress," and the Rev. Tony André, of Florence, on "The Liberal Movement in Italy," which, on account of their length, we were obliged considerably to curtail, are here printed in full. Due acknowledgment is made of the service rendered by the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, A. E. O'Connor, and E. L. H. Thomas and Mr. Charles Weiss as translators of papers contributed in German and French.

The photographic group of most of the chief members of the Council with some other helpers and friends, taken at St. Ermin's Hotel, appears in a reduced form as frontispiece, and the volume is also enriched by full-page portraits of seven other members, who could not be included in the group, Pfleiderer, Drummond, Boros, Janson, Tchertkoff, Wicksteed, and Stopford Brooke.

It is not necessary that we should dwell here any further on the contents and quality of the papers, and would only once more strongly urge the importance of securing a wide circulation for the book.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE ON KING ALFRED.*

IT was a happy thought which suggested to Mr. Brooke, at this time of the special national Commemoration, the republication in separate form of the chapter on Alfred in his "English Literature from the Beginning to the Norman Conquest," published three years ago. But this little book is not merely a reprint of that chapter, valuable and deeply interesting as it is, for in the Preface of eight pages Mr. Brooke gives us a fresh study of Alfred's character, and in a substantial Appendix Miss Warren has added a number of extracts from the King's writings, the fullest easily available selection of the kind with which we are acquainted. Add this to Mr. Frederic Harrison's Harvard lecture, and the Mayor of Winchester's Commemoration volume, noticed in THE INQUIRER of Sept. 14, and Mr. Wicksteed's article in the same number on Alfred as a writer, and we should have no excuse for ignorance or indifference to our greatest King on the most winning side of his character. "No doubt," says Mr. Brooke in his Preface, "Alfred's lofty character is seen most clearly in the work he did both in war and peace; but there is an inner life of thought and feeling in public men of which the world sees little; and this, which in Alfred was sorrowful, sensitive, humble-minded, and profoundly religious, appears in the additions he inserted into the translations he made of Latin books for the instruction of his clergy, his nobles, his people, and for his own private pleasure. The style, too, in which he wrote—childlike, at times, in its simplicity, and sincerity, and marked by an individual naïveté—is also a revelation of the way in which his mind and spirit worked together."

It is in his version of the "Consolation of Philosophy" by Boethius that we see most of Alfred, and find the most of his original additions. It was his last great work, and in it we have "an image of the temper and spirit of the King when the labour of his life was, in a time of long hoped-for peace, drawing to its close." In the extracts here given, we touch, Mr. Brooke says, "the lonely hidden spirit of Alfred."

We feel the principles, social, moral and spiritual, which ruled his life. We see him as his children and his intimate friends saw him. The wise ruler appears in them, the King conscious of his rank; but strangely mixed with that, the man to whom all men were equal if they were good and true. Rank, wealth and power were to Alfred the mere clothing of the man. Goodness, truth, fidelity, honourable work, trust in God, made the man who, if a King was false to these righteous things, was greater than the King. There was a Judge before whom power, cleverness, wealth and rank were worthless, and Alfred lived in that faith and ruled himself as King thereby. In that faith was held his view of men, and his behaviour to them. There are few pleasanter pictures in history than those in which we see Alfred in equal social intercourse with his friends, his followers, and the men who came to tell him tales of far-off lands or to bring him knowledge. Irish scholars, sea-captains, men from Jerusalem, India, Rome, from European Courts and monasteries, freemen who came on his progress to complain of the injustice of their lords—whom he received while he was washing his hands—bards who brought songs and MSS. from the North, his bishops whom he harried into writing, his Ethelings whom he drove to read enough law to do their duty as magistrates—all who had anything new or useful to tell him, were welcomed frankly and talked to as man to man. Yet with this sense of human equality, he was always the ruler, the master who was resolved to do justice, to slay the evil-doer whatever his rank, to secure the state, to make law prevail.

We must not quote further from this striking Preface, nor from the chapter which follows, with its account of Alfred as the beginner of literary English prose. It includes some of the most interesting passages of Alfred's own writing, while, as we have already said, Miss Warren's Appendix adds a further ample collection.

The first passage quoted in the Appendix is not from the King's own writings, but from Asser, describing Alfred's method of work; then follow selections from the "Pastoral Care," Bede's "History," Orosius, the old English Chronicle, and Boethius. From this last, as an example of Miss Warren's skill in rendering, and as showing the quality of the book, we will in conclusion quote one of the shorter passages:—

The True Blessedness.

Then said Wisdom, "Well, O men, well." Let every one who is free strive towards goodness and blessedness, and whoso now is bound by the vain love of this earth, let him seek freedom that he may come to blessedness. For that is the one resting-place of all our toil, that is the one haven always calm after all the tempests and the surgings of our toiling. That is the one place of peace and the one comfort of the miserable after all the miseries of this present life. But gold and silver stones, and every kind of gem, and all this present weal, enlighten not at all the eyes of the mind, nor at all whet their sharpness for beholding true happiness, but they rather blind the eyes of the mind than sharpen them. For all the things which please us here in this present life are earthly and are therefore fleeting. But the wonderful brightness which enlighteneth all things, and ruleth all things, willeth not that souls should perish, but willeth to enlighten them. If, then, any man can see the brightness of the heavenly light with the clear eyes of his mind, then will he say that the brightness of the shining of the sun is darkness beside the eternal brightness of God,

H. S. SUTTON AND EMERSON.

SINCE writing the memorial article on Henry Septimus Sutton, which appeared in THE INQUIRER of Aug. 31, we have been privileged, through the kindness of his widow, to see a copy of the first edition of the Poems, and also to obtain fuller and more exact knowledge of Sutton's intercourse with Emerson.

In the copy of the Poems of 1848, the two booklets (published at Nottingham: R. Sutton, Review Office), "Poems," pp. 98, and "Clifton Grove Garland," pp. 62, are bound up in one small volume, in the familiar green cloth of that period, and in an advertisement at the end are offered as one volume for 2s.; and then on a final page follows Sutton's dedication to his father, dated Oct. 30, 1848.

In our former article it was said:—

> Sutton, in his young enthusiasm, went over to Manchester in 1848 to hear Emerson lecture, and to see his "Master" face to face.

But as a matter of fact, before that visit to Manchester, when he only went to spend the week-end with Emerson, he had made his acquaintance at Nottingham, and there heard him lecture.

To the Manchester City News of May 20 and 27, 1899, Sutton contributed two very interesting articles on "Emerson: Reminiscences of his Visits to Manchester"; and to the Nottingham Daily Guardian of Nov. 21 and 22, 1900, two other articles on "Emerson and his Friends in Nottingham."

From these we learn that in December, 1847, Emerson gave three lectures in the Hall of the Nottingham Mechanics' Institute, on "Napoleon," "Domestic Life," and "Shakespeare," on the first Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of the month. His coming to Nottingham was due chiefly to the active interest of Mr. J. Neuberg, a German, engaged in business in the town, who entertained Emerson at his house in the Park. Neuberg, who afterwards, having retired from business, was of great service to Carlyle in hunting up materials in Germany for "Frederick the Great," had been attracted by Sutton's "Evangel of Love," published earlier in that year, and had made his acquaintance.

Sutton reported Emerson's lectures professionally, and after the first Neuberg asked him to come and meet the lecturer at dinner on the following Wednesday.

This he did with great delight, meeting there also Philip J. Bailey, the author of "Festus," whom he had learnt to know earlier in that same year, and two other congenial guests. Of what he felt after that great occasion, Sutton says:—

> I walked home that night feeling that, like a lucky paper kite, I had been sailing magnificently in a glorious air high above this oft "dim spot which men call earth."

Sutton was then a young man of twenty-two, and Emerson, in his prime, just double that age. On the Saturday afternoon, when his lectures were over, the great American called upon his young acquaintance at his lodgings, and stayed talking for half-an-hour. Neuberg had shown him "The Evangel of Love," and he began at once to talk about the book, and then passed to the subject of poetry and Carlyle, and asked Sutton about his friends. He also mentioned William Allingham, who had lately written to him from Donegal. To Sutton it was a half hour "crowded with more thought and feeling than could now be crammed into half a day," and he quotes Bailey:—

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most—feels the noblest—acts the best.

Emerson, in the course of their conversation, told him that "he was not able himself to talk much, he was not strong, and he never was willing to come in contact with people unless they would open their whole soul to him." And Sutton writes:—

> Here be it said that during all the interview I could not fail to perceive that I was being subjected to a close investigation. So might some human insect feel when held with stern though kindly forceps in the brilliantly lighted field of a magnifying lense. My thorax, head, proboscis, antennæ, eyes, wings—in short all my little belongings—were, I conceived, being made to look larger than they really were. And yet, so far as I knew, I had no desire to roll up into anything like an offensively or defensively prickly ball. In truth, these were no experiments of vulgar curiosity, nor was it even merely scientific inquiry. Searching as was the inquisitiveness, the purpose was evidently friendly and most kind. It was happily implied in the process that I was being accepted as a new boy in the great Master's school, which of itself was a huge promotion. Assuredly this tutor had a perfect right, if he chose to take the trouble, to measure the altitude of his fresh pupil's aspirations and to find the bounds of his ignorauce and knowledge. (Nottingham Guardian, Nov. 21, 1900.)

Emerson afterwards told Sutton that he constantly reminded him of Thoreau, about whom they had a good deal of talk. Sutton could not at first understand how that could be, but came to the conclusion that it was because he had been bold to speak his mind quite frankly, and he found that Emerson, being so constantly surrounded by admiring enthusiasts, greatly enjoyed meeting anyone who would stoutly contradict him.

On the following Sunday morning, at Neuberg's kind suggestion, Sutton went to the house of Mrs. Henry Turner (Dr. Martineau's cousin), in Beeston Lane, to see more of Emerson, and found Miss Anna Swanwick also there. Leaving at about half-past two, he and Emerson walked back together along the banks of the Leen, through pleasant meadows and past the Castle rock, to Neuberg's house. They talked on all manner of subjects, Emerson, among other things, advising him to read the Bhagavad-Gita, and to begin Plato with the "Phaedo," but also to read the "Republic," which, he said, "contained all modern Europe." Sutton on his part told Emerson of his favourite books, and among them "Pilgrim's Progress" and Mrs. Rowe's "Devout Exercises of the Heart," which had specially charmed him by its many quotations of poetry, including some from George Herbert, with which, he says, he fell in love at first sight.

On the last Thursday of December, Emerson saw Sutton off at the station, going to the Isle of Wight to be present at the wedding of his friend A. Fryor to Miss S. N. Rose, after whom "Rose's Diary" was named. On his return Sutton found an invitation to an evening party at the William Enfields', to meet Emerson, but unfortunately arrears of work which had to be attended to kept him too late and he could not go.

But before long he was to see his friend again. Early in 1848 Emerson lectured in Manchester, and on Jan. 29 Sutton went over with Neuberg, with a special invitation for Emerson to stay with him in his lodgings at 2, Fenny-street, Higher Broughton. There was not room for him to sleep in the house, but, as Emerson wrote, he was to have his "bread and water" there. They went first to Dr. Hodgson's, at the Chorlton High School, where there was a gathering of friends in Emerson's honour, and there Sutton first met the late Alexander Ireland, to whom, as his "Manchester correspondent," Emerson pays so high a tribute in "English Traits."

Going afterwards to Emerson's lodgings, Sutton found Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill there, a second guest, whose acquaintance Emerson had recently made in Birmingham, and had similarly asked over to Manchester. They talked till midnight, and Gill repeated to them his ode to St. Cecilia, afterwards published in his "Anniversaries." Next morning they breakfasted together and talked till noon (it was Sunday), and then went across to Mr. Ireland's rooms. Later in the afternoon they returned to Emerson's lodgings, and other friends came in, and after tea Emerson read to them his essay on Plato, reading it "slowly and clearly, after his grave and stately manner." On Monday morning Sutton and Gill again breakfasted with Emerson, and then Sutton was obliged to return to Nottingham.

When Emerson was next in Manchester in 1872, Sutton was settled there and again saw his friend at Mr. Ireland's house at Bowdon. Of this he writes (in the Manchester City News, of May 27, 1899):—

> He (Mr. Ireland) had invited all the old friends, and many new ones, who wished to see Emerson, and these filled a large room as full as it would hold. Making my way slowly through the crush to where Emerson was standing, I succeeded in shaking hands with him, and we were just beginning to compare notes when a sudden rush of eager competitors for his attention swept me away from my friend. I saw at once that these had greater claims upon him than I. Already, in by-gone years, had I not had much more than my share of the light of his countenance? And, naturally, these other friends were now anxious to bask for once in that light which would probably never again beam in their neighbourhood. For me remained the pleasure of witnessing their gratification, and with this I was content.

LIEUTENANT F. W. LAMBELLE, M.B., B.S., of the Royal Army Medical Corps, and eldest son of the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, has just been appointed to the surgical command of Connaught Hospital, Aldershot. During his brilliant and successful College course, in which he gained most of the scholarships and prizes and the gold medal for fifth-year men, he was an earnest and acceptable preacher in the churches of Durham and Northumberland, preaching nearly every Sunday. Since his removal to the South he has not been less interested in the work, his voice having been heard in more than one of our Southern churches. We wish for him every success in his professional career.

UNITARIAN WORKERS' UNION.

SIR,—Through your paper I wish to thank our Hungarian friends of the Unitarian Churches and Carpathian Club for the splendid hospitality they have shown us. It was unfortunate that we could not be present at the actual opening of the College buildings, but we cannot help believing that the enthusiasm created by our visit will add something, however little, to the éclat of the proceedings on Sept. 22.

We felt when we stood before the boulder-stone at Déva, from which Francis David preached the Unitarian faith, the public profession of a return to pure Christianity, that we had reached the "Caaba" of Unitarians, and further on at Kolozsvar "the Mecca." The intentions of our band of pilgrims have been fulfilled. And if we exclaim "Allah il Allah!" it is with a fresh prayer that the Holy Spirit shall bear us to greater self-control, and the effects of our journey shall be felt everywhere at home and abroad in a higher ideal of what Christianity means to us. There shall be neither Jew nor Gentile, Bond nor Free Englishman nor Boer, Hungarian nor Wallach, white nor dark skin, but the poorest and most ignorant shall be held by us as a brother to be helped on in an upward career. Never again can we say that Unitarianism is unfit for the masses and the peasantry when we have stood in that immense church in Toroczko, surrounded for many miles round by a Unitarian peasantry.

In conclusion may I make a little correction. The silver wreath mentioned in Mr. Shrubsole's letter was not presented to me but to Mr. Boros in recognition of the great service he had done the Budapest congregation in forming a Francis David Society. We were present at the inaugural meeting, but left after the pleasant social tea before the presentation took place.

No one walking in the streets of Kolozsvar with Mr. Boros could fail to notice the constant greetings he received with something more of reverence in them than mere formal courtesy demanded. Long may he be spared to render such services to the Unitarian cause.

CHRISTIAN THEISM.

SIR,—I have been much interested in Mr. Poynting's fine analysis of Christian Theism. The first half of it commands my full sympathy, but the latter half appears to me a little too vague, not quite logical enough. How do we come to attribute "character" to God? And when we speak of assimilating our will to the will of God, how do we ascertain God's will? We Unitarians who are not prepared to take the Bible records as infallible cannot rest our faith in God's character on any words attributed to Jesus — as, for instance, when he is made to say that the wicked "shall go away into eternal punishment."

Christ's representation of God's character was accepted by his disciples because it corresponded with the highest conceptions of that day. Perhaps it does not quite correspond with the highest conceptions of the present day. In any case the character and the will of God can only be embodiments of what we regard as our highest conceptions.

In the world of Nature we recognise the highest possible intelligence, and we can only conceive of this as existing in a personality. But it is only in our own souls that we recognise the highest phases of moral and emotional character, and from these we form our mental image of the character of God. Our idea of the will of God is derived in the same way from what seems to us the highest Right. What we need to do is so to cultivate our emotional reverence for the Right that it shall always rule our actions in spite of any contrary desire.

Our object is not so much to do the will of God, which of course always is done if He is omnipotent, but rather to bring ourselves to that condition which appears to us the highest possible, and to which we believe that the discipline of life is leading us.

FREEDOM AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

SIR,—Cannot the discussion on "Free-will and Necessity" be simplified by abandoning old terms of philosophical and theological usage? The most likely method of ascertaining truth is surely that of careful observation; in this case, by noticing our own minds, and listening to the facts of psychology. The following points seem to be specially evident:—1. That ideas are indissolubly connected with activity, so that every thought seeks expression in gesture, speech, act, or deeds. 2. That our ideas spring out of wishes and emotions, but also from mental habits and impressions caught from others. 3. That we possess a controlling power, by means of which we can mostly decide for the future whether this or that idea shall be allowed to influence us, and can substitute one for another.

Now responsibility seems to lie in the use or neglect of this faculty. We are reasonably blamed if we permit ourselves to be the creatures of impulse, because we might have so strengthened our controlling power that it would have placed stable instead of volatile ideas before our minds. This power over self is the source of all considered action; it is the root of success in determined characters; it enables us to realise high ideals; it lays our nature open to influences divine and human; and, in its moral scope, it voices the "ought" and the "shall not" of conscience.

I do not know whether I am a Determinist or a Libertarian, but the above statement appears to fit in with my personal experience. Of course it is, and it must be, difficult to measure the amount of blame attaching to those who have not had the opportunity of learning the laws of their being.

E. A. MANNING.

THE HUMAN SELF AND ITS FREEDOM.

SIR,—Mr. Badland's thoughtful letter expresses, I think, real difficulties which, with many persons, stand in the way of their full acceptance of the doctrine of Free Will; and, accordingly, I would suggest for your consideration whether a little symposium in your pages on this question would not be both interesting and helpful to a moderate number of your readers.

If this should be feasible, will you kindly allow me to open such a discussion by stating as briefly and clearly as I can the direction in which I am disposed to look for a solution of Mr. Badland's main problem? My view will, I hope, fairly represent the general Libertarian position; and, owing to the little time at my disposal just now, this paper is all that I shall be able to contribute. I believe, however, that there are among us several who are both able and willing to take part profitably in a friendly conference and from whose pens we may expect valuable expositions and defences of the respective views taken not only by Libertarians, but also by Absolute Idealists and by those whose sympathies are in the main with the Spencerian evolutionists.

It is evident that an exhaustive insight into the profound depths of the human personality is possible to God alone; still we have, I think, in the facts of our moral and spiritual life adequate grounds for believing that our personalities are so constituted that when in seasons of temptation our higher nature (or, as I should prefer to say, the immanent God) prompts one course of conduct and our personal desires or ambitions impel us to another and a different course our true Self, out of whose complex character these conflicting promptings arise, possesses the power of deciding between two equally possible alternatives, of determining itself either on the right or on the wrong side, and by so doing of either ennobling or degrading our characters. The Absolute Idealists, on the other hand, contend that the Self is nothing but the unity of the Character, and that, therefore, its moral decisions at any moment express, and can only express, the dominant nature of the Character at that moment. Consequently, to these thinkers the free choice between alternatives of which I have spoken appears to be a mere figment of the imagination. If, say they, the state of our characters at the moment of the moral decision had been different, we should have decided differently, but our several characters being what they were, only one decision, and that the one actually made, was open to us. And when the Libertarian makes the objection that if all through our manifold temptations it was never open to us to decide otherwise than we actually did decide, we surely cannot reasonably be praised or blamed, or held morally accountable for our conduct and the development of our characters, the Absolute Idealist's reply is "the moral decision was your own; it was the spontaneous expression of your dominant character at the time; it was not forced upon you by any extrinsic compulsion, and, therefore, you are morally responsible for it."

Now this Hegelian account of the matter is evidently very plausible and fascinating; for, on the surface at least, it seems at once to satisfy the soul's intellectual craving for unity and for complete scientific explanation, and at the same time to harmonise with our moral consciousness. This being the case, it is not surprising that in our predominently scientific age this theory not only rapidly captivated the region of professional philosophy and psychology, but for a time, especially in Germany and later in this country, largely dominated the pulpit also. In the purely scientific and philosophical world this conception of moral freedom is still the most prevalent one, and naturally so; for, as its ablest and most distinguished living advocate, Dr. Edward Caird, remarks, the Libertarian view "offends science by the assertion of a kind of freedom in individuals which seems to be the negation of all laws of causation; and it offends philosophy by the denial that there is any point of view from which the differences of things can be brought back to a rational [I should say 'intellectual'] unity." But imposing and all-explaining as this Hegelian view of man's moral freedom seems to be, and mightily tempting as it is to all speculative scientists and system-making psychologists and philosophers, I feel no hesitation in expressing my firm conviction that it cannot retain permanent hold on human thought; that it is surely doomed at last to wreck itself completely on the indestructible rock of man's moral and religious experience.

Even already its power over religious thought is almost entirely a thing of the past. It has nearly vanished from the pulpits of Germany, and in this country the clergymen, such as most of the writers of Lux Mundi, who, under the spell of T. H. Green's genius, once adopted it, have now mostly become silent about it. And why is this? It is, I believe, because reflective persons in dealing with the facts of morals and religion have come to see the fallacy which vitiates this doctrine that moral freedom means no more than power of self-determination. They have come to see, what common-sense has seen all along, that if a man is to be regarded as really responsible for his sins and crimes, it is not enough to say that no external influence compelled him to take the wrong course; it is necessary to hold also that by no intrinsic necessity, by no hindrance arising out of his essential constitution, was the wilful wrong-doer incapable of taking the right course.

If then, I contend, we are to have a conception of the human Self which shall be in harmony with the general sentiment of moral responsibility, it must be of a Self which in the moral crisis of its life has a power of exercising its causality not simply in one determinate way, but in either of two equally possible ways. In answer to my friend Mr. Badland's questions about the essential nature of the personal Self, I should say that, to my mind, it seems a fundamental error to confound the personal Self with the Character. As I have said elsewhere:—

> While our character determines the nature of our temptations, we are, I believe, clearly conscious that it is not the character, but the Self which has the character, to which the ultimate moral decision is due. In every moral crisis of a man's life he rises in the act of moral choice above his own character, envisages it, and passes moral judgment on the springs of action he feels to be present within him; and it is just because a man's true Self can thus transcend and judge his own character, and can freely choose between and act upon the conflicting elements in its character, that genuine moral freedom and moral responsibility become possible and actual.*

But my friend may still press me with the question: If the Self is thus free to choose between siding with a lower and siding with a higher motive, is not the way in which it will determine itself in temptation a matter of "Chance?" To this the answer is, that if by "Chance" is simply meant that the Ego's moral decisions in times of temptations might have been other than they were (and this appears to be all that the word "Chance" in this connection can mean), then certainly these moral decisions are a matter of chance. But so far from being frightened by this word "Chance," I quite agree with Professor William James that we have good reason to adore the Supreme Being the more in that He has been both able and willing to introduce into His Cosmos this very small but quite infinitely precious element of indeterminateness, moral freedom, or, if you so choose to call it, chance; for it is to the reality of this true moral freedom that we owe all that is noble and heroic in human conduct, and also all that highest and purest blessedness which springs out of our felt inter-personal relations with that immanent Spirit who is at once

> Centre and Soul of every sphere,
> Yet to each loving heart how near!

And for myself I am satisfied, though I cannot enter upon this further question now, that Dr, Martineau, Professor William James and other eminent thinkers have abundantly shown that while the Eternal has by conferring on man this greatest gift of moral freedom achieved His highest object in the evolution of the Universe, He has not by the admission of this small measure of indeterminateness precluded Himself from the final attainment of other great and precious, but secondary, intellectual and social ends.

Charles B. Upton.

P.S.—Allow me to add in further explanation of my position the following passage from a very able work by Mr. Horatio W. Dresser, "Voices of Freedom," which was published last year:—

> Because the will is indetermined or free, it is impossible adequately to state why it chooses this or that alternative; it is an end in itself. We may find reasons for a choice—after we have made it; we may discover many reasons in advance and carefully select the righteous motive or alternative. But that does not exhaust the fact of choice. The fact that it was a choice, followed by free activity, shows it to have been in some respects pure matter of chance until the deed was done. In the last analysis, all we can say is, that it is an ability of the self to enjoy freedom, morally to choose, individually to act, as a creative first cause—understanding by "creative," the act of selecting and redirecting that which already exists.—(p. 94.)

[We shall be glad to have some further contributions to this discussion, as Mr. Upton suggests, but owing to the great pressure on our space, which has now begun with the winter's work, we are afraid that it will not be possible to extend the symposium to any length.—Ed. Inq.]

OBITUARY.

MR. G. L. BRISTOW.

We deeply regret to have to record the death of Mr. George Ledgard Bristow, of Cedars-road, Clapham Common, which took place at Barnfields, Haslemere, on the 19th inst. Mr. Bristow, who had reached the age of seventy-four years, was born at Exeter, where his father was for more than twenty years the minister of the Congregational Church. He chose the law as a profession, and after serving his articles with a firm of solicitors at Sidmouth, was admitted as a solicitor, and removed to London, where he joined a well-known City firm, which still carries on business at Copthall-buildings. He remained an active member of that firm (now Wilson, Bristows, and Carpmael) until the time of his death. He was widely known as an upright, conscientious and able lawyer, and possessed the entire confidence of a large body of commercial and private clients. He had recently acquired a property at Haslemere, upon which he had built a house, intending it as a summer residence, when an illness overtook him which has proved fatal. He leaves a widow and a family of five daughters and three sons, of whom one son is a partner in the firm, and one daughter is married to another partner.

Mr. Bristow has for many years been connected with the Unitarian Church at East Hill, Wandsworth (where the funeral service was held on Tuesday), and has taken an active part in the Christian work carried on there. He has also not only supported liberally the benevolent institutions connected with our body, but has given valuable personal service to several of our societies, being a member of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at the time of his death. Universally esteemed for the integrity and courtesy of his character, he was sincerely beloved by all who were privileged to know him personally.

TOLSTOY AND TOLSTOYANS.

Mr. Vladimir Tchertkoff, whose striking address to the International Council in Whit-week will not soon be forgotten, began in the Echo of Tuesday week a series of articles on "Religion and Politics in Russia," to be continued from time to time. Under the heading of this first article, as on the popular issues of Tolstoy's writings from the Free Age Press, Christchurch, Hants, which Mr. Tchertkoff superintends, is the characteristic announcement, "No rights reserved."

Since his last attack of illness, from which he suddenly and quite unexpectedly recovered, Tolstoy, we learn, has again been actively engaged on his writings. Of what the prospect of death was and is to him, Mr. Tchertkoff tells in the following passage:—

> Tolstoy refers to his late illness with gratitude as a happy time, when the consciousness of the life of the spirit, liberated from that of the body, was especially dear to him, and when all that previously appeared insoluble cleared up well and easily, by the aid of his universal spiritual panacea, self-condemnation, humility, and love.
> To the death of the body Tolstoy has for long past been completely indifferent. For him the chief interest of life lies in its spiritual essence; whether it shall continue "here" or "there" is now completely immaterial to him, ready as he is for the transition. Just as formerly, when he regarded as his "self" his animal life, he could not contemplate any life after death, so now he cannot imagine a cessation at death.

Proceeding to speak of Tolstoy's teaching, Mr. Tchertkoff states that he is not a "Tolstoyan," notwithstanding personal friendship and the veneration he has for the Count as a thinker. There can only be one ultimate authority, "the inner voice of one's own consciousness."

No one can more fully recognise the enormous influence for good which has reached mankind through the medium of Tolstoy; nor could I fail to appreciate with the deepest gratitude the fact that in my own individual development I have gathered more help from him than from any other living man. And yet I feel it desirable to particularly emphasise my conviction that to put oneself in the position of a disciple or follower of Tolstoy would only indicate a complete misconception of the understanding of life shared by Tolstoy and his true friends. In this sense Tolstoy is not a Tolstoyan. He has, in fact, been heard to say that from no one does he feel farther apart than from those who regard him as their leader.

And then Mr. Tchertkoff adds this passage, taken from Tolstoy's diary of a few years ago:—

"The other day a girl came asking the question (so usual, so artificial) what she must do to be useful. Talking with her, it became clear to me that the great evil from which millions suffer is not so much that they live in positive wickedness as that they do not live according to their own conscience. Instead of their own conscience, people take some other person's conscience, higher than their own (Christ's most frequently), and obviously being without power to live according to this other conscience, they conform neither to that nor to their own, and so live without conscience. I advised this young lady to live, not by my conscience, as she wished, but by her own. But she, poor girl, does not even know whether she has a conscience of any kind or not. This is a great evil, and it is most important that men should develop, make clear to themselves their conscience, and then live according to conscience; and not do as all do, choose another person's conscience unattainable to themselves, and then live without conscience, and lie, lie, lie for the sake of appearing to live wholly in conformity with this selected other person's conscience.

"To speak of 'Tolstoyism,' to seek guidance, to inquire about my solution of questions, is a great and gros error.

"There has not been, nor is there any 'teaching' of mine. There exists only the one eternal, universal teaching of the Truth, which, for me, for us, is especially clearly expressed in the Gospels. This teaching invites man to accept his sonship to God, and therefore his freedom or his subjection (call it as you like)—freedom from the influence of the world, and subjection to God, to His will—and as soon as man has understood this teaching he fully enters into direct communion with God, and has no longer anything to ask of anyone."

We may add that among the most recent of the Tolstoy publications of the Free Age Press (Christchurch, Hants) are two fourpenny booklets of "Popular Stories and Legends," the first opening with the well-known story, "Where Love is, there God is," and the second with "What men live by." There is also a new penny pamphlet (dated August, 1901) on "The Only Means," expounding the great principle of Reciprocity, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you even so do ye also unto them"—as the only hope of social regeneration and deliverance for the masses of the people.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Kiss for a Blow.

II.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Wind seemed to have passed on, his stirring influence was still present. The waves had changed their slow measure to a quick step. They curtseyed saucily to the rock and cliff, and even, now and then, copied the wind's rude example and dashed their spray into their grim faces. Mr. Cliff took this in good part, and merely pushed away the drops, and blinked them out of his eyes without saying a word; but Mr. Rock grew angry. And when several waves linked arm-in-arm came at him with a bound, he struck them violently, so that they fell in scattered foam back into the laps of those which were racing in behind.

"It was not our fault," they cried, collecting themselves together as best they could. "The others pushed and jostled us so that we had to wash over you."

"Ah, oh! you've hurt us," others sobbed.

"You've broken our strings of pearls and diamonds," moaned some.

"And our sapphires, amethysts and emeralds," others murmured.

"My diamonds! My pearls!" roared Father Neptune, suddenly appearing from his palace at the bottom of the sea, and he raked the shining gems together with his trident and vanished as fast as he had come.

Still Mr. Rock continued furious, and the more those merry, impish waves played their tricks upon him the harder he struck them and the less he seemed to care how much he hurt them. Even the cotton-wool clouds had gathered together to watch what was going on, and many a sea-gull and cormorant sailed by and expressed his opinion in his own peculiar language.

This give-and-take game was growing serious, and far beyond the harmless thing it had been at first. The waves now drenched Mr. Rock continually, instead of, as before, merely splashing his rugged feet, and they seemed urged on by malice. But this was only seeming. They were in reality kissing the huge monster, and their lips were wet with refreshing brine. This had been tossed and turned in Neptune's mill and each drop re-made since last it had visited that shore only twelve short hours before. Their kisses were boisterous but well-meant, only the rock would not understand. His existence was so unchanging, you see, that he had no chance of learning anything more than he knew from the beginning.

"If you hit me I'll hit you, and you know well enough who can give the hardest blow," he cried, knowing no better, poor fellow!

Then the waves, very white and covered with new pearls and diamonds, for they had picked up plenty more and strung them together—these waves drew close to one another and talked the matter over. They had soon made up their minds, and then they scattered away, tumbling over each other, picking themselves up and in the highest good humour. A moment later their plan of action declared itself.

Mr. Rock, the old crosspatch, having given a tremendous kick to his playful assailants, one wave separated herself from her companions and, advancing, threw a handful of crimson sea-weed high up so that the rock might catch and keep it. Instead, he angrily hurled it down again.

Next came another wave, draped in shining green watered satin, and tossed a necklace of large pearls to the sulky giant, crying out—

"There is a present, just to show that we feel kindly towards you in spite of your anger."

"And here are snowballs for you to play with and throw about. We never intended to vex you, and our soft touches cannot hurt," said another.

"There are diamonds and emeralds, the very biggest I could find," cried yet another.

"And what can I offer when these have given their lovely things?" asked a sheet of snowy foam, bounding and swirling about the frowning rock's foot. "I will just kiss you once with my salt cool lips, and ask you to forgive us all, and to believe that we only meant to play with you while practising our dancing for the Lady Moon. We think our game might be called 'A kiss for a blow.'"

There was no answer. Then something cold touched me and I started up. The rising tide had washed up to my feet. I fancy I must really have fallen asleep and dreamed all this. What do you children think?

RUTH MILLS.

Birmingham.

WHEN Emerson remarked that "men descend to meet," he pointed out a flaw in our common intercourse with each other. We descend because we have a worse opinion of them than we have of ourselves. We are pharisees, esteeming ourselves and despising others. T. T. Lynch hit the case off with exquisitely keen sarcasm when he exclaimed, "How deplorable are the faults of our friends! Living amongst them as we do, it is surprising that we are so good as we are." Instead of descending to meet our companions, we ought to ascend. Not in fawning or flattery, but in all sincerity, we ought to appeal to their better selves without reference to their worse. Herein lies part of the service church-membership and communion yield us. It is assumed, of course, that all who sincerely worship God together are on the upward plane, living in the pure and purifying light of the eternal world, faithfully endeavouring to "rise on stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things." Thus, as Emerson might say, we ascend to meet.—H. S. Sutton, in the Manchester City News, May 27, 1899.

WORLD-WIDE METHODISM.

THE third Methodist Œcumenical Conference concluded its sittings in London last week. A closely packed programme extending over twelve days, with only the two Sundays and Saturday afternoons for rest in between, must have left the delegates somewhat exhausted, and indeed one hears of attendances thinning away towards the close. But this Conference is only held once every ten years, and the five hundred delegates came together to represent over thirty millions of Methodists of various colour and persuasion in all parts of the world, so that a less substantial programme might well have been considered inadequate to the occasion. And indeed there is something very impressive to a sympathetic observer, even to one in whose face the door would have been sharply closed had he attempted to gain admittance, in the spectacle of such a gathering, and the strenuous purpose with which the Conference set itself to work.

We do not profess to have read even a condensed report of the whole of the proceedings, but with the help of the Methodist Times we have been able to enjoy a good deal and to find abundant interest in the papers and discussions, many of which displayed great vigour and a fervent passion with which it is refreshing to come into contact. With much that was said we find ourselves in the heartiest agreement, as in the earnest pleading for renewed attention to the vital question of religion in the home, and on many aspects of social reform; and if we do not find that questions of Biblical criticism were dealt with in a very thorough or convincing manner, or that the defences of spiritual religion against materialist or secularist arguments were set on what we could feel to be secure foundations, on the other hand the emphasis laid on experience in the realm of practical religion turned our thoughts in a direction which we judged to be of the utmost profit. Our interpretation of such experience may differ greatly from that of our friends, but with the elements of vital religion we also find our deep concern.

We noted at the time of its delivery the Conference sermon by Bishop GALLOWAY, of the American Methodist Episcopal Church, South, on the supreme value of Christian experience; it seems to us to have been the most striking and helpful utterance of the whole fortnight. Methodism sprang into being when there was much coldness and formality in the current religious life, and it insisted on the need of a "renewed and clearly-attested inner life—a life consciously hid with CHRIST in GOD." The Bishop quoted Dr. STOUGHTON, the historian of Religion in England, as saying, "Methodism grew out of the feeling that religious experience, and the truth which produces it, take precedence of everything else, and that to these primary objects all which is merely ecclesiastical must be kept in strict and lasting subordination." And having quoted other characteristic sayings, he proceeded :—

> The rapid spread of the revival under the Wesleys, Whitefield, and their coadjutors was due to the fact that they insisted upon a present conscious forgiveness of sins, obtained by faith in the promise of Christ. The pulpits of that day, both in England and America, preached a religion of form and service, without an experience of grace and peace. Mr. Whitefield said, on his first visit to America, that the preachers talked of "an unknown and unfelt Christ, and that the reason why the Churches were so dead was because they had dead men to preach to them. When the Wesleys and their co-labourers began preaching the blessed doctrine of the witness of the Spirit, it was denounced by unconverted clergy as a heresy, but was hailed by the masses as a new revelation. It was light out of great darkness, an evangel of hope to a people long used to the dull, weary platitudes of a comfortless, purposeless pulpit. Religion was no longer a dreary drudge, but a joyful experience—a vital and vitalising power in the soul.

And in concluding a very earnest and impressive sermon, the Bishop quoted a prayer of "the sainted RICHARD BAXTER," with the hope that it might be the personal petition of every member of the Conference and of Methodists throughout the world :—

> Thou hast mercifully given me the witness in myself; not an unreasonable persuasion in my mind, but that renewed nature, those holy and heavenly desires and delights, that surely can come from none but Thee. . . . Without Thee, books are senseless scrawls, studies are dreams, learning is a glow-worm, and wit is but wantonness, impertinency, and folly. Make me the more heavenly, by how much the faster I am hastening to heaven; and let my last thoughts, words, and works on earth be likest to those which shall be my first in the state of glorious immortality, where the Kingdom is delivered up to the Father and God will for ever be all, and in all; of Whom, and through Whom, and to Whom are all things, to Whom be glory for ever. Amen.

Such experience as is here pleaded for, it may be urged, can only be theirs, who have found their peace by the way which is described as the Evangelical scheme of salvation; but it is our happiness to know that there is a larger truth, which can embrace all that is essential and life-giving in such teaching, and that we also, though with differing apprehension of the truth, may know "the peace of sins forgiven," the redeeming power of Eternal Love, and have our share in the peace of GOD, which passeth understanding.

But while that is so, we may also take to ourselves the warning that to maintain its vigour a church must be active, not merely in polemic argument but in unselfish service, in constant, eager effort to share with others the treasures of the spiritual life, to help the poor and neglected, and those that sit in darkness, to rise into the clearer light and warmth of a divine fellowship, in which the FATHER'S love is felt to be supreme.

One of the subjects set down on the programme was, "How to mobilise the whole Church." It was to have been dealt with by Mr. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, but owing to his illness it had to be put into other hands. But in the number of the Methodist Times immediately preceding the Conference, we find this reference to the subject :—

> At present the active work of Methodism in all lands is carried on by minorities, and often by small minorities, of our people. The majority of adherents are drones in the hive. Dr. Chalmers once said that the Methodists multiplied and prospered amazingly because they were "all at it, and always at it." If the great Scotchman had known us more intimately he could not have spoken of us so highly. Distance lent enchantment to the view. We have never been all at it, or always at it. Everywhere there are a few full of zeal and devotion, but the majority do little or nothing. Our moral standard is higher than ever, but where is the "passion for souls" which laid the foundation of our world-wide prosperity? How many of our millions are consumed with an irresistible longing to bring sinners to Christ? How many even of the 500 members of the Œcumenical Conference have received the Pentecostal blessing and are baptised with the Fire of God? Since the last Œcumenical Conference was held one of the greatest of Methodist ministers has fallen asleep in Christ. Let him being dead speak to us once more. The greatest and most blessed result of the Third Œcumenical Council would be that every member of it should return to his own land equipped for highest service with the "Tongue of Fire" of which William Arthur wrote. If this Conference witnesses a repetition of the Day of Pentecost, it will do more than anything else to solve all our intellectual, moral, and financial difficulties. The fire would spread to the ends of the earth, and the whole Methodist army would be mobilised, would be placed on a war footing, and might reap such victories for Christ as neither the eighteenth nor the nineteenth century witnessed. Let us pray for that.

How far this prayer has found an answer it is not for us to say, but we may find something to ponder in these words. The baptism of the Spirit is given to those who set themselves in the line of humble duty, who are ready and eager to work, and who are attentive to the inward promptings of the Highest. We may not be abashed even when we hear the tramp of the great armies passing over the fields of the world intent on a divine service. We have our own post of duty, and the same passion of loyalty may enkindle our hearts. If the service of those greater hosts is in singleness of heart, in the interest not of a denomination but of the Kingdom of GOD, we can be unfeignedly thankful for their success; and for ourselves we must forget the fewness of our numbers, not in the noise of the thirty millions, but in the stillness of a Divine Communion, and the steadfastness of a purpose, which looks to GOD and His holy truth, and to the needs of men and their call for the sacrifice of self-forgetting love—and in work and prayer find the blessedness of life in which the FATHER'S will is done.

WE have had the pleasure this week of welcoming Mr. Zennosuke Toyosaki, of Tokyo, Japan, who landed at Tilbury dock on Wednesday, having come to this country to study at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Toyosaki was formerly a preacher among the Methodists in his own country, but having grown dissatisfied with their doctrine, he was drawn, largely through the influence of Mr. Murai, into fellowship with the native Unitarian movement. It is to enlarge his experience and to gain increased power for such work, that Mr. Toyosaki comes as a special student to Manchester College, and we would assure him not only of a cordial personal welcome, but of the great interest that must attach to the presence of a member of his community in our Free School of Theology.

IN the Autumn Exhibition at the Walker Art Gallery in Liverpool there is a marble bust of the late Rev. Charles Beard, by Mr. H. R. Hope-Pinker. Working only from photographs and without personal knowledge of Mr. Beard, it was not to be expected that the sculptor would achieve such a wonderful likeness as he did in the statue of Dr. Martineau in Manchester College, but this bust is certainly of great interest and is a fine work of art. Of the likeness we find it difficult to speak with confidence. At some points we seemed to see the well-remembered face, and then again it appeared to be some one else. Intimate friends will perhaps find it difficult to be satisfied, and yet the bust does not belie the nobleness of the face, and the likeness may prove to be greater than first impressions have revealed.

THE ANCIENT CHAPEL OF TOXTETH.

THERE is no place of worship in Liverpool, or, indeed, in the whole country, with a history quite like that of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth. Before the days of Nonconformity it was a little country chapel, the religious home of earnest Puritans, among whom early in the seventeenth century Richard Mather was the first minister. In 1635 Mather, having been silenced by the ecclesiastical authorities, left his native country and settled in New England, being the father of Increase and the grandfather of Cotton Mather. The chapel in Toxteth Park seems never to have been consecrated, and after the Act of Uniformity became a recognised Nonconformist place of worship. Its subsequent history is similar to that of many of the old chapels, in which the congregation, in the exercise of freedom of thought, passed from the old orthodoxy by gradual steps to modern Unitarianism.

The present quaint and venerable building, in its beautiful grounds, dates only from 1774, but it stands on the site of the older chapel, said to have been built in 1618, and embodies some of the old material. In the floor is an old brass, recording the death of Edward Aspinwall in 1656, and close by is the grave of John Brekell who died in 1769, having been the second minister of the old Key-street Chapel, in Liverpool, of which the present representative is Hope-street Church.

In the burial-ground of the Ancient Chapel are the graves of many men well known in our community; here one sees the names of James and Christopher Rawdon, Richard Vaughan Yates, Richard Rathbone, Henry Booth, George Holt, father and son, George and Charles Melly, Samuel Bright, William and Timothy Jevons, Thomas Avison, W. J. Lamport, Alfred Higginson, James Thornely, H. W. Meade-King and other distinguished laymen, while here also are the graves of John Hamilton Thom, who began his ministry at the Ancient Chapel, and Charles Beard. On one grave-stone are the touching lines:—

In Memory of Herbert son of James and Helen Martineau,
Aged 10 years.
Oh Life too fair! upon thy brow
We saw the light where thou art now.
O Death too sad! in thy deep shade
All but our sorrow seemed to fade.
O Heaven too rich! not long detain
Thine exiles from the sight again.
Born August 14, 1835;
Died March 28, 1846.

Thus there are many sacred memories gathered about the Ancient Chapel, which preserves its old world charm, even though it is now closely surrounded by ugly buildings, and the electric trams disturb its Sabbath quietness.

But the Ancient Chapel is not only a cherished memorial of the past, it is the home of a living congregation, now prospering under the ministry of the Rev. W. J. Jupp, and the congregation have just built and opened a new meeting-room, as will be found reported in our news of the churches this week. The new building has been designed with great skill, in complete harmony with the old chapel and the beautiful quiet of the burial-ground. As one enters the garden gate and looks up the long path with its graves on either hand, the meeting-room is seen through the trees at the upper end, not overshadowing the old chapel, and hiding an ugly modern building beyond, so that so far from interfering with any old association it is a real addition to the beauty of the place, while at the same it time is a token of the new vigour in the congregation and a promise for them of increased usefulness, and closer, happier fellowship.

Of the translations of the Latin epitaph in the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth which we have been able to consider, the following, though far from perfect, seems to us, on the whole, the best, as most nearly literal and in keeping with the tone of the original:—

She is gone—
My beloved daughter Elisa is gone!
Beautiful, joyous, kind,
My child is gone!
So frank and so intelligent
Adorned with all graceful gifts and not unlearned,
Of pure mind, rich in piety,
My daughter has passed away.
Farewell, my own Eliza, farewell!
Thee, long to be missed and yearned for, thy father mourns; missed and yearned for, yet, thanks to God Most High, not lost;
For the happier time will come when I shall see thee, my child, again, and live with thee for ever.

Matthew Dobson to his own dear, sweet, and blessed Elisa, who at the age of seventeen, and in the year 1778, quietly passed into heaven.

Of the other renderings which friends have sent us, and for all of which we are greatly obliged, we must be content to add only this one:—

She is gone,
My child beloved—
Eliza!
Beauteous, delightsome, kind—
My child is gone!
As frank and free as she was shrowd,
By worthy arts and noble lore adorned,
Yet holy and devout—
My child is gone!
Farewell, Eliza mine, farewell!
Thee, yearn'd for long, thy father mourns,—
Thee, yearn'd for long, but, thanks to God,
Not lost.
For there shall come a happier time
When I shall see thee, O my child, again,
And live for evermore with thee.

This to his dear, his sweet, his blessed one,
His own Eliza,
Has Matthew Dobson raised,—
Eliza,
Who dwelt here seventeen years
And in our Lord's year seventeen seventy-eight
Went peacefully to heaven.

Another memorial tablet of great interest in the Ancient Chapel is that to the memory of Jeremiah Horrox, erected a few years ago, which on a disc of white marble bears the following inscription:—

This Tablet is erected to the memory of Jeremiah Horrox, who foretold, and was the first to observe the Transit of Venus across the Sun's disc on the 24 Nov., 1639. He also made other valuable discoveries in Astronomy. He was born in Toxteth Park, near Otterspool, about 1618, and died there 3 January, 1641. It is believed that before going to Cambridge he was a pupil of the Rev. Richard Mather, the first minister of this chapel, and that within its precincts he was buried.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

I.

In my first lecture, among the Anglo-Norman chroniclers who wrote before the death of Stephen, I made no mention of Geoffrey of Monmouth. This was not because he was not, in any real sense, a chronicler at all, but because I wanted to speak of him in a special connection as chief representative of a literary movement which, though for a time it did little for history, eventually exerted a very far-reaching influence upon it.

The Keltic Revival.

The Keltic spirit in the country, which had been stirred from time to time in the days of the Danish invasion, was very deeply excited by the Norman Conquest. The downfall of their ancient enemy at the hands of a people with Keltic tastes and affinities and cosmopolitan interests, awakened national hopes and memories in Scots, Welsh, Cornish, and Bretons. Keltic patriotism and Keltic fancy were kindled. Songs and tales sprang up of triumph over the Saxon. In the Historia Britonum, a book of undoubted Welsh origin, full of the traits we have noted in Gildas and Asser, but of doubtful date, ascribed to Nennius, probably written after the Conquest, the Britons are proudly derived from one "Brutus," a supposed descendant of Æneas; and a youthful bard, "Ambrose," prophesies the victory of the Welsh Red-Dragon over the hated White-Dragon of the Saxons. "King Arthur" here makes his first appearance, as the magnanimous conqueror in twelve battles with the English. Soon—Welsh fancy working swiftly—this mythical hero grew into a real personage. William of Malmesbury (1125), attacking the fables told of Arthur, seems to have thought that there was such a man. A few years later Ambrose developes into the magician Merlin, and the vision of the dragons becomes a body of metrical oracles known as Merlin's "Prophecies," wherein the flight of the Germanic worm to its hole and the extermination of its seed from the Welsh garden is confidently predicted. These "prophecies" were published in Latin, at the request of Henry of Huntingdon's friend, Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, before 1135, by Geoffrey of Monmouth; and in this form probably they were known to Orderic before 1142.

Geoffrey of Monmouth.

From Geoffrey of Monmouth the Keltic and romantic revival received an extraordinary stimulus. He was about ten years younger than William of Malmesbury, a monk and then archdeacon of Monmouth, and bishop of St. Asaph in 1152, in which year, or shortly afterwards, he died. Before he published the Prophecies of Merlin he had commenced an Historia Britonum, which he finished about 1138 and dedicated to William of Malmesbury's patron, the half-Welsh, illegitimate son of Henry I., Robert Earl of Gloucester. It is based, he says, with mock gravity, on "a very ancient work in the British tongue," brought to him by "Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford"—perhaps Walter of Calne. The history of the Saxon Kings he will leave to William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntingdon, but he advises them to be silent about the kings of Britain as they have not this work in the British language. If this British work existed only in Geoffrey's imagination, it is quite clear that they had not got it. But even if it had any real existence, it is obvious that he quotes it with the same delightful impudence as when he refers his readers to Homer for the statement that Brutus built Tours, or tells us that he would have reported what an eagle was believed to have said at Shaftesbury, "had he thought it true, like the rest of the history." His book, of course, is a piece of audacious make-believe, the first of its kind in our literature. After the manner of a chronicle, the story of the British King is magnified until he overtops, not only the English Aelfred, but, as William of Newburgh angrily protested, the Greek Alexander.

King Arthur.

Born, by Merlin's magic, of Uther Pendragon and Igerna, the innocent wife of Gorlois, Arthur is crowned, at the age of fifteen, "a youth of matchless courage and magnanimity, universally beloved." With help from his sister's son, Hoel, King of Brittany, he delivers his country from the heathen Saxon yoke. His helmet is of gold, engraven with the figure of a dragon; on his shield, Priwen, is the face of the Virgin Mary. Ron is the name of his spear; and his trusty sword, Caliburn, was forged in the Isle of Avallon. He subdues Picts and Scots, restores York to its ancient beauty, marries Guanhumara, who "surpasses in loveliness all the women of Britain," reduces Ireland, Iceland, Gothland, and the Orkneys to his rule, and establishes a knighthood which becomes famous on the Continent for its valour and courtesy. Then he conceives the idea of a conquest of Europe, overcomes Norway, Denmark, Aquitaine, and Gaul, defeats in single combat a Roman tribune Flollo, and keeps his Court at Paris. His British capital, Caerleon-on-Usk, rivals Rome. At Caerleon he lives in noble state, holding tournaments wherein "the chivalry of the men encourages chastity in the women, and the love of the women is a spur to the warriors' valour"—a characteristic sentiment at this time and significant on the lips of a monk. When the Romans ask tribute, Arthur demands it of them, and declares war on the Empire. On his way to Rome he has adventures with a Spanish giant on St. Michael's Mount in Brittany. His butler, Bedver, first explores in a boat, climbs the lesser mountain, led by the light of a fire on the summit and a dismal howling, and discovers near the fire an old woman in lamentation by a newly-made grave. Gathering from her where the monster lives, Bedver returns to his chief, who then makes for the neighbouring height. Here also is a fire, at which the hideous savage, besmeared with blood, roasts swine-flesh. At their approach he seizes his club, which two strong men could scarcely lift from the earth; but Arthur, the original of Jack the Giant-killer, blinds him with a wound on the forehead, and at length drives Caliburn through his skull. With a roar, as of a tempest, and a thud like that of a falling oak, the giant comes to the ground; and Arthur, bursting into a loud laugh, bids Bedver cut off his head. This was his greatest exploit since he slew the giant Ritho on Mount Aravis, who clothed himself with the beards of kings. From Gaul he is about to cross the Alps when he hears of the usurpation of his nephew Modred and his adultery with Guanhumara. Abandoning the enterprise, he returns home, Modred escapes to Winchester, and thence into Cornwall, but is there slain; Guanhumara flees to a nunnery; and the king, mortally wounded in the last fight with Modred, resigns his crown, and is "borne away, to be healed of his wounds, to the Isle of Avallon."

Other Stories.

Other good stories begin with Geoffrey. He first tells of Cornish giants, still prominent in our nursery literature; of Locrin and his love for Estrildis, whom he entertained in a palace underground, and whose skin for whiteness "not ivory, nor new-fallen snow,-nor lily could exceed," and of their daughter Sabren, whom Milton, a delighted reader of Geoffrey's Historia, introduced into Comus; of Leir and his daughters, the victims of Shakespeare's tragedy; of Gorbogud and his sons, whose quarrels are the subject of Sackville and Norton's play; of Kymbelinus and his sons Guiderius and Arvir agus, of Cloten and Gennissa, who appear in Shakespeare's Cymbeline; of Hudibras; and, though here Henry of Huntingdon may have preceded Geoffrey, of Coel—the Old King Cole of children's rhymes.

Influence of the Historia Britonum.

Geoffrey's Historia was a new book when Henry of Huntingdon was shown a copy of it, by Robert of Thorigny, at Bec, in 1139. Astonished, but impressed—perhaps by Geoffrey's knowledge of British antiquities and grave air of authority—Henry made a digest of it for the fourth edition (1145) of his Historia Anglorum, which Robert of Thorigny, in apparent good faith, added to his Norman Chronica, when he was abbot of the stately monastery on St. Michael's Mount from 1154 to 1186. Another copy was obtained with difficulty by Alfred of Beverley, in Yorkshire, between 1145 and 1150, and, as he had neither time nor money for a complete transcript, summarised by him for his Historia de Gestis Regum Britanniæ. About the same time Earl Robert of Gloucester's own copy was in this neighbourhood, and it may have been the one hastily used by Alfred. It was borrowed from the Earl by the Baron Walter Espec for a Norman lady, Constance FitzGilbert, who, unable to read Latin, had it turned into French verse by a scholar in her household, Geoffrey Gaimar. Thus "King Arthur" passed into Norman Court-literature. Half a century later he returned to England from Normandy, and made a triumphal entry into English poetry. In one way the Welsh king did conquer the Saxons. When, after a melancholy silence of a hundred and fifty years, English song once more raised its voice in the land, its theme was not English but British. Layamon's "Brut," in language and feeling, is English to the very core; but its hero is not Beowulf, nor Wade, nor Alfred, nor Byrtnoth, nor Hereward, but the Keltic Arthur. This is, indeed, no small revenge.

Quickening of Fancy.

I have dwelt on this chapter of our

* The second of two lectures delivered in Manchester College, Oxford, Aug. 5 and 6, in connection with the Summer Meeting of University Extension Students.

literary history because it gives us insight into the tendencies of the period, and prepares us for the coming time. Geoffrey's romanticism was contemporary with that in other countries. "Arthur" grew up with the Flemish Reynard, the Spanish "Cid," and the heroes of the German "Nibelungen Lied." From various causes—not the least of which was contact with the East through the crusades—fancy and imagination were quickened all over the Continent, in literature as in other forms of art. History was affected as well as poetry. During the reigns of the Angevins—from the accession of Henry II. to Magna Carta—our chronicling was less monastic than before, widened by the influence of the universities, closer to the Court and more political, less insular, more varied, brighter, more entertaining—if you will, more journalistic. Even an English fiction, not purely fanciful like Geoffrey's but legendary, built on a substratum of fact, such as the Gesta Herwardi, sprang up from within the monastery itself.

"THE SHEPHERD OF HERMAS."

"The Shepherd of Hermas" is the title of a very ancient Christian writing, which nearly won for itself a place in the New Testament. It was written at Rome in the first half of the second century. Its author is unknown. He was certainly not the Hermas who is mentioned by St. Paul: and the statement in the Muratorian Canon that he was a brother of the Bishop of Rome is at least very doubtful. The name and the personal details which are given in the book itself may be only a part of its imaginative framework; but it is clear that the writer has put into them a great deal of his own character and experience. He tells us that he had been sold as a slave to a lady at Rome, whom, however, he afterwards "loved as a sister," i.e., a sister in Christ. But he was not a slave when he wrote. He was, or had been, engaged in business; and blamed himself for having been too much engrossed by it to the injury of his Christian character and faith. After a period of prosperity he met with serious losses, which he regarded as a salutary Divine chastisement for his own faults or for those of his family. He then had leisure for writing the long-winded and complicated but suggestive visions of which the book is made up. They are evidently in the main simply a literary form in which the writer had a naïve delight, though they may, perhaps, have been founded upon actual visionary experiences. In any case they express the mind of the writer and exhibit his character.

The Writer's Cheerfulness.

He describes himself, or his alter-ego Hermas, as being strict in his conduct and self-restrained, and at the same time of a cheerful disposition. "Patient, good-tempered, and always smiling," he says in one place. And that is borne out by the whole tone of his writing. Its dominant note is cheerful trust in God. He insists most strongly on the virtue of cheerfulness. He utterly condemns the gloomy self-tormenting spirit, "the worst of all spirits and direst to the servants of God," and bids his readers "put on cheerfulness" and "grieve not the holy spirit which is given to man cheerful"; a fine and characteristic expression. His emphasis upon cheerfulness is the more noteworthy as he was living in contact with the wretchedness of ancient Rome, and with the expectation, as he himself tells us, of being crucified or thrown to the wild beasts in the arena. The moral earnestness of Christianity in presence of a corrupt heathenism was already tending to asceticism, morbid severity, and gloomy fears, but Hermas, though not without effort, kept himself for the most part free from those things.

A Book of Practical Religion.

The book is divided into three parts—Visions, Commandments, and Similitudes; but they are all given in the form of detailed visions and conversations. "The Shepherd," who is mentioned in the title, was "the Angel of Repentance," and appeared to Hermas in visions.

There is no systematic theology in the book. Its doctrinal statements are given incidentally for practical purposes. The one great doctrine is belief in God. The first of the commandments given by "The Shepherd" reads thus:—

> First of all believe that there is one God, who created and finished all things, and brought all things out of non-existence into existence, containing all things and alone uncontained. Have faith therefore in Him, and fear Him; and, fearing Him, have self-control. Keep these things, and you will cast away from you all wickedness and put on the strength (or virtue) of righteousness, and will live to God if you keep this commandment.

Great stress is laid upon faith; but it is simply the condition of awe and trust leading to righteousness. Godly fear, trust and obedience, or, as he says elsewhere, "Faith, awe and obedience," those are what Hermas puts first. And the centre of his faith is God, not Christ. He even describes the Christian martyrs as suffering "for the name of God," not of Christ.

The Nature of Christ.

The name "Christ" is not used in the book, it is always "the Son of God." Of his nature Hermas has a very exalted idea. He says "The name of the Son of God is great and immeasurable, and supports the whole world"; and, though the Son of God was recently manifested, he "is older than all his creatures, so that he was a fellow-councillor with the Father in His creation."

But with that must be compared what Hermas says of the Church. The Church appeared to him in a vision as an old woman; old "because she was created first of all, and for her the world was made." That pre-existence of the Church before the creation can only have been as a divine idea. And it is by no means clear that Hermas thought of the Son of God existing as a personal being from the beginning. Indeed, he makes some sort of approach to identifying the Son and the Holy Spirit. There is much dispute as to his exact meaning. But he says that the Holy Spirit spoke to him in the form of the Church, "for that spirit is the Son of God." And the Holy Spirit with Hermas is certainly not a personal being but a personification of the spirit of holiness. He has no clear and definite doctrine about the nature of Christ.

The Atonement.

So, too, about the Atonement, all he has to say is, that the Son "purged away the sins" of the people, "having suffered many trials and undergone many labours," and "then showed them the paths of life, giving them the law which he received from his Father."

The book is not a doctrinal treatise. In visionary form it is a series of earnest religious and moral exhortations, warnings against sin, and calls to righteousness and repentance and trust in God, to truth and peace and cheerfulness and unworldly spiritual life.

Not a Sacerdotal Book.

Neither is there any trace of Sacerdotalism. Though the book was written at Rome there was no supreme Bishop, but only bishops or overseers, who, as in the New Testament, are identical with the presbyters or elders. Baptism is a special means of forgiveness; but the only condition of restoration for sinners is repentance. We still breathe the atmosphere of primitive Christianity, without priesthood or any sacerdotal system.

Sin and Repentance.

There are thoughts concerning repentance which are worth noticing:—

> For the Lord swore by his glory concerning his chosen; if any sin after a certain fixed day they shall not have salvation. For repentance has a limit for the righteous. . . . But for the heathen there is repentance till the last day.

That is a fine thought. Those who acknowledged the claim of God's service in righteousness may fall away from it, and yet repent and return to God: but there must be an end to that, or they will become hardened and incapable of repentance. But for those who have not yet felt the claim of the higher life in God the way of repentance is always open.

Another thought Hermas often takes up but never gets quite clearly expressed. For all past sin, however great or often repeated, there is forgiveness on repentance. But to presume upon that forgiveness, and be careless about sin, thinking that we may repent at any time, is an altogether deadly thing. It is the way to destroy the possibility of sincere repentance.

Against Evil Speaking.

It is not possible in short compass to give any account of the visions of which the book consists. They are too long and dull for quotation, though there are many happy touches. But we may notice some of the Commandments taking them out of their visionary setting. The second commandment, immediately following the first general demand of faith in God and righteousness, is a very simple practical matter. "First, then, speak evil of no one, nor listen with pleasure to any one who speaks evil." We go back in thought to those early days of Christianity in Rome; we expect to hear some great demand of high strung enthusiasm; but the first special injunction Hermas has to give is simply: don't talk or listen to scandal. Those early Christians, martyrs some of them, with a courage and enthusiasm of faith that could defy the one organised power of civilisation at the very heart of the empire, were yet evidently very human in their weaknesses. And it shows us something of the character of Hermas that he should have given so prominent a place to the command against evil speaking. "A disorderly demon never at peace always at discord," he calls it.

Almsgiving.

He follows this by enjoining indiscriminate almsgiving, laying the whole responsibility on the recipient. We have learnt to regard that as a sin, but only from considerations that had not entered his sphere of thought. Apart from them his teaching is the simple dictate of love. "Give to all." He elsewhere has the curious idea of a sort of partnership in devotion between rich and poor; the rich, who were too busy for many thanksgivings, furnishing the occasion of thanksgiving to the poor who had the time, and sharing in the benefits of their devotion; just as the elm that supports the vine contributes to produce the fruit.

Truthfulness.

The third commandment of Hermas is Truth. "Love the truth and speak nothing but truth." He places it upon a religious basis, saying that all falsehood is cheating God by restoring to Him untruthful the spirit which we have received from Him truthful. And he had a profound sentiment of truth which made him exclaim that he had never spoken a true word in his life.

A Patient and Contented Spirit.

The fifth commandment may be given with considerable condensation.

Be patient, long suffering, and the holy spirit that dwells in thee will be pure and rejoice, but it is choked and polluted by anger, as a little bit of wormwood spoils a whole jar of honey. And the Lord dwells in patience; but anger is bitter and pollutes it, and the devil dwells in anger. Complete faith shuts out anger. But when faith is weak anger inserts itself, and for nothing the man or woman is embittered, about daily food, or a little word, a friend or presents, or some such silly things.

It has a curious interest for us to hear of those early Christians grumbling about their dinners. And there is a serious moral lesson for us. Now as then there is an important application and test of our Christianity in the little things of daily domestic life; keeping the bit of wormwood out of the jar of honey. For even a small disturbance drives out the peace of God, and stifles the holy spirit within us.

The Power of Obedience.

We must not consider the following seven commandments, but we may take a quotation from the general conclusion. Hermas says to the Shepherd:—

These commandments are great, and good, and glorious, and fitted to gladden the heart of the man who could perform them. But I do not know that these commandments can be kept by man, because they are exceeding hard. He answered and said to me, "If you lay it down as certain that they can be kept you will easily keep them, and they will not be hard; but if you come to imagine that they cannot be kept by man, you will not keep them."

There are many things that are easy enough if we really make up our minds without hesitation. But if we try without confidence, we condemn ourselves to failure beforehand; because, as Hermas puts it, "thou hast already judged for thyself that they cannot be kept."

Simplicity of Life.

Hermas is not an ascetic, but he taught the importance of having few wants. He felt that wealth and business were a hindrance to religion, by entangling and distracting the mind; besides (which was then an important consideration) constituting a great temptation in time of persecution. He blames selfish luxury, but he does not make a merit of self-mortification. Even fasting, which was already in vogue as a religious observance, he sets aside as useless. He describes himself as keeping an accustomed fast, but the Shepherd says that such fasting is "of no value," and will "do nothing for a righteous life." The true and acceptable fasting is this: "Do no evil in your life, and serve the Lord with a pure heart; keep his commandments . . . and let no evil desire arise in your heart; and trust in God." But, at the same time, when that is done, he approves of fasting in this fashion: "On the day of your fast taste nothing but bread and water, and give what you save to the poor."

A very Human Book.

Hermas has not much literary skill; though I doubt whether that was his own opinion. He is very prosy, working out his often pretty and striking fancies and similes in tedious detail. But in his way he was an original thinker, expressing his own thoughts in his own words. Among the few contemporary writings that have been preserved, his book is alone in having no direct quotations from Scripture. But in other respects he was typical of the Christianity of his time. It was not a theology, but a spirit and a life—a beautiful spirit and a noble life. Hermas was earnest and cheerful. He was prepared to face martyrdom. In one of his similitudes he gives a strong picture of the great tribulation he expected soon to come. But he is not so much concerned with that as with humble practical duties. We see in his book that those early Christians, who built up the church, and infused something of the spirit of Christ into the world, and whom we are apt to idealise till they pass out of our living sympathy, were very real human beings, with their weaknesses and common temptations, as well as the intense and indomitable enthusiasm which the whole might of the Roman Empire was afterwards powerless to crush.

There is a good translation and introduction to "The Shepherd of Hermas" in Donaldson's "Apostolic Fathers." And there is an inferior, but more accessible, translation in the second volume of "The Apostolic Fathers," forming part of "The Ancient and Modern Library of Theological Literature."

C. D. BADLAND.

THE thirteenth annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, it will be seen from the advertisement in another column, is to be held on Tuesday week in Kensington. The assembly meets alternately in London and the country. Last year's meeting was at Horsham, and hence the present meeting in town. At the service in Essex Church, which has just been reopened after renovation, the Rev. Edgar Daplyn is to be the preacher, and at the public meeting in the Queen's-road Art Gallery in the evening the Revs. Joseph Wood, Henry Gow, and F. K. Freeston, with Mr, John Harrison, are to be among the speakers.

WHAT THE LAITY CAN DO.

"THE vitality of Christianity depends upon the happy union of great ideals with great service." So writes the Rev. C. E. St. John, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, in the Christian Register, and proceeds to urge that such truths and ideals as Unitarians now hold "can be made the basis of a religious activity equal to or greater than any which the world has ever seen." The special plea of the two articles, from which we are about to quote more fully, is that the laity in our churches have not yet risen to the full measure of the service they can render in extending their active ministry of living religion. In the first article, the title of which we have adopted above, Mr. St. John writes:—

"If any Unitarian finds himself so situated that he cannot attend his church, and there do service to the cause that is nearest to his heart, why all the more need that he should find his own way of doing service to that cause. If he cannot listen to his minister, he should himself forthwith become a minister; and by the earnestness, yet kindliness, of his proclamation of the things which seem to him greatest in the world, succeed now and again in helping some other soul to see God and life as he sees them. A periodical religion is a very poor sort of a thing. It is one of our distinctive claims that our religion is a daily affair. May the time soon come when our laity draw the natural inference from this opinion of ours, and so live as to make this religion influential every day through their own acts and words.

"In short, why should not all our people talk a great deal more than they do about the sublime things of our faith? They need not do this in a way that is contemptuous toward other people's convictions, not in any way which implies that they think that we alone have all the truth. Furthermore, it would not be possible for any single Unitarian to fall into religious cant. We have been altogether too much afraid of that peril; for it is not one associated with our conceptions of God, life, duty, and immortality. There is no possible incentive for a Unitarian to be insincere in his religious assertions. If he says anything about religion, it is always because he really thinks what he says."

And in a further article, on "The Training of a Church," Mr. St. John continues his plea as follows:—

"Still dwelling on the subject of lay-workers, it seems to me that in few of our churches have we developed to a sufficiently high degree the power of working as a unit. Wherever we have consecrated ministers, there our churches send out individuals whose lives are of ceaseless benefit. Inspired by their religion, individual Unitarians are among the most efficient philanthropists and moral guides in the community. Surely, no one will understand me to overlook the incalculable value of this individual righteousness when I call attention to the fact that, when righteous individuals work intelligently and continually together in some high cause, the results of such union are also of measureless value.

"Now a church ought to mean a union of workers, and not merely a centre of inspiration for individuals. There are few of our churches which could not be greatly improved in the way of systematic, united religious work. Very much has been done in this line of improvement by the Women's Alliance, the Young People's Religious Union, and the Unitarian Clubs; but it is a curious reflection upon our church system when, in order to produce united action in the work of the church, it is necessary to do it under some other name than that of the church. What we need is that not merely young people or women or men, as such, should maintain united efforts, but that all the children of God who band themselves together as a church should have a more distinct and united comprehension of what they might be about. We fall short of this ideal because we have deligated too exclusively to the minister certain aspects of our work. It is most fitting that every member of a church should be competent to state the common beliefs of the church, competent to administer religious comfort to people that are in sorrow and trouble, competent to make God a living and present reality to those who know Him not. If any one of our ministers could develop a good method of training the large majority of his people to enter thus upon ministerial work, which clearly is the highest and most lasting of any of the works of the Christian Church, he would lay the foundations for the next great advance of our denomination.

"What are sometimes called confirmation classes constitute a move in the right direction. There should be in every church ceaseless and thorough processes of instruction calculated to inform the minds of the members of that church as to its cardinal principles and at the same time to arouse the spirit of loyalty, so that every man and woman shall be both able and willing to be in some degree a minister of religion. This education should be directed to the producing of a body of people who are competent to conduct classes and lead religious services, not only on special occasions in the church itself, but systematically in the regions lying round about the church. The church of the future will not be content with simply an ordained minister and services in one temple. It will, on the contrary, send forth a great body of unpaid ministers through whose faithful efforts many services shall be maintained in school-houses and private dwellings, as well as in churches and chapels. Such a church as this would be making incessant appeals to human nobleness and repeated demands upon human service, would hold young people, and keep up the interest of older people without intermission.

"This religious training of the laity in a church would not of necessity obliterate all their natural tact and common sense. The most zealous would easily understand that there is a time to talk and a time to keep silent. The trouble is that the allotment of time for silence has thus far been very excessive among us. The excess of sensibility which makes us fear to give offence in offering to discuss a religious subject has been carried to such an extreme with us as to throw abroad an impression that we are not interested in the spiritual advancement of others than ourselves. It has created an impression of coldness on our part. Now our religion is not in itself a cold one; and our hearts are simply human hearts capable of all kindliness and brotherhood. It is the duty of our churches to call out to the fullest extent the power which lies waiting in that human nature of ours."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeals.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards writes:—"We are recommencing the Boys' Club at Fort-road, Bermondsey, on Wednesday next, and shall be glad of some Magazines suitable for boys over the age of fourteen, and also of Illustrated Papers. We are wanting about £2 to supply a few things lacking in the gymnasium. Last winter there was a weekly attendance of fifty to sixty boys, and we are hoping to secure as large an attendance this winter. All the helpers are volunteers. Parcels to be sent to me, addressed to the Caretaker, Fort-road Unitarian Church, Bermondsey."

Manchester: Bradford.—The Rev. W. E. Atack writes:—"The Ladies' Committee in connection with Mill-street Free Church, Bradford, Manchester, have arranged for a Jumble Sale on behalf of the church and school expenses to be held on Monday, Oct. 28. We were very grateful for the support given us on the last occasion, and we should be glad if any of your readers can again help us. Parcels should be addressed to the chapel-keeper, Mr. Williams, 29, Chatham-street, Bradford, Manchester, or to myself. Whilst writing, may I mention that we are in much need of a bagatelle board for our Social Union (composed largely of elder scholars). A present of one from one of your readers would be most acceptable, or (failing that) if anyone will put me in the way of getting one cheap it would be helpful to the work here." Mr. Atack's address is Cheetham House, North-road, Clayton, Manchester.

Harvest Services.

The reports of Harvest Thanksgiving Services come in at this time of the year in such profusion and with such abundance of detail, that we must be content to note those of last Sunday very briefly. At Birmingham, Hurst-street Mission, services were conducted morning, afternoon, and evening by the Rev. W. J. Clarke, anthems being rendered by the school choir. At Cirencester the Rev. H. Austin made special reference to the Harvest of Great Souls, speaking of Alfred the Great and President McKinley. At Hale Chapel the morning preacher was the Rev. C. Peach, the evening preacher the Rev. C. Roper, both of Manchester. The collections amounted to £18 4s. 3d., a large increase over last year. The windows of the chapel have recently been reglazed with diamond panes. At Halstead, where the congregation has decidedly improved since the Provincial Assembly took charge of the Church, the service was conducted by Mr. P. W. Ames, F.S.A., of Lewisham. The church band rendered Mozart's "Twelfth Mass," and the congregation, the largest for many years, numbered from 150 to 160. At Maidstone the Rev. S. S. Brettell was the preacher. Anthems were rendered by the choir, and the offertories were highly satisfactory. At Manchester, Oldham-road, the harvest service was united with the anniversary of the dedication of the church, the Rev. Walter Reynolds conducting the services morning, afternoon and evening. Special hymns were sung, and the evening congregation numbered nearly 250. The collections were fairly good. At Ringwood Mr. G. A. Ferguson, of Manchester College, Oxford, was the preacher, in the morning speaking to the children, and in the evening taking as subject Emerson's saying: "When we sow acts we reap habits, when we sow habits we reap character, when we sow character we reap destiny." In the evening the Harvest Service of Song by Bowie and Tosh was rendered. The collections, £2 10s. 2d., were for the Ringwood Diamond Jubilee Nursing Fund. At Stalybridge the Rev. W. Harrison told of his recent experiences as one of the visitors to Hungary, dwelling specially on the fruitfulness of the country and the warmhearted friendship of the people for England and the English. He described the splendid reception given, and the prevalence of Unitarianism in Transylvania. In the afternoon there was an organ recital, and the collections were larger than on any similar occasion.

Bootle.—On Sunday week the Rev. J. Morley Mills gave an address in the Bootle Free Church, entitled "From Orthodoxy to Unitarianism," being an extremely interesting record of his own personal experience, from his early training among Wesleyan Methodists, his father being a local preacher, his own early years as a Primitive Methodist minister, to his subsequent adherence to the truth of Unitarian Christianity. The address is fully given in the Bootle Herald of Sept. 21.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel.—The new meeting-room, which has been erected in the chapel grounds for the use of the congregation of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, was opened on Sunday evening, when a service of consecration was conducted by the Revs. W. J. Jupp, minister of the chapel, and V. D. Davis, a former minister. Mr. Jupp, in his sermon, spoke of the ideal of religion, in close touch with every aspect of life, to which that room was to be devoted, in the service of which every member of the congregation would find a part, with diversity of gifts, but in the one spirit. The little room, which will hold from 100 to 130 people comfortably seated, was completely filled. The room is in complete harmony with the old chapel and its surroundings, and is most admirably arranged and furnished. On Tuesday evening the opening celebration was completed by a social meeting, which was also very well attended, though to prevent hopeless overcrowding the invitations had been limited. The chair was taken at eight o'clock by Mr. P. H. Holt, and Mr. B. P. Burroughs, secretary of the congregation, read letters of congratulation and regret for absence from the Revs. C. B. Upton, J. Harwood, and J. E. Odgers, former ministers of the chapel, Mr. William Rathbone, Mr. Rhind, the architect (to whom warm indebtedness was expressed for the happy result achieved), and others. Mr. Holt, in his opening address, congratulated the congregation on the success of the room, and spoke of the principle of religious freedom which they had inherited, and which had left the way open for the progress of thought. They might be few in numbers, but they had their own part in the service of religion. The Rev. V. D. Davis recalled the constant attachment of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom to the Ancient Chapel, of which, as a young man, he was minister, before going to Renshaw-street, and his confidence in the future of the congregation. In reply to a letter of congratulation on his eightieth birthday, Mr. Thom had said they ought to be making provision for the future, and that was what they had done in the building of the new room, which gave to the congregation means for completer service. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong spoke of the progress of religious, as of other thought from artificiality to naturalness, and of the universalism which was coming to be recognised in all great religious truths. The old special doctrines were fading and crumbling out of being, and a new sense of the universal relation of man to God was taking possession of them all. There were certain stimulants to righteousness in the old way of thinking which they no longer possessed, and unless their belief lifted up character a reaction in theology and religion would follow, and their grandchildren would be found fumbling among the old creeds again. But if they were true to their religion and allowed it to bear fruit in character, there was a sure future within their grasp. The Rev. Dr. Klein spoke of the enlarged conception of religion which they cherished, in which the church was no longer everything, and the value of the social element was understood. In that room they had provision for that further element in their religious life. At the Ancient Chapel there was little need for the warning, but they all had now to take care not to allow the social element to make them heedless of the church. Mr. Henry Jevons, as the oldest member of the congregation, recalled some interesting memories of the earlier days, and Mr. J. Coventry, the treasurer, stated that the cost of the room and the furnishing, which was about £1,250, was practically met, but they must bear in mind that maintenance would have to be provided in the future. He mentioned a welcome contribution of £1 from the children and teachers in the Sunday-school. The Chairman said that the Rev. Mark Simon, of the neighbouring Congregational Church, had expressed a cordial wish to be present, but a meeting at his own church prevented his coming. The Rev. W. J. Jupp said that he was beginning to think that his dream of a religion of freedom and fellowship was now to be realised. That room came to him as a gift, for which he was very thankful. It belonged to the congregation, it was for their use, a home for their various activities, in which he hoped to be allowed to have a share. He asked them to ponder in the coming days what each one would do in the common work, and in what spirit it must be done. In the chapel they came together to cherish fellowship with the Highest, and they had a religion that was infinitely precious, in touch with spiritual realities; their work with its fresh opportunities must grow stronger in the same spirit, and as they entered into the possession of that room it might well be with the silent aspiration of that ancient prayer, "May the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it."

London: Essex Church (Reopening Services).—On Sept. 22 the reopening services at Essex Church, Kensington, took place. The Rev. Frank K. Freeston preached morning and evening to good congregations, and the new organist, Mr. Albert Toll, presided at the organ. During the vacation extensive works have been executed to both the church and schoolroom, at a cost of upwards of £450. The fine wood roof of the church has been cleaned and revarnished, and the whole of the internal brickwork and stonework brushed down and cleaned, including the reredos, pulpit, and font. The electric light has also been installed throughout, and the improved lighting was much appreciated at the evening service. As the schoolroom is used nearly every evening in the winter months, a new low-pressure hot-water apparatus has been provided to heat this room alone. The works have been executed under the personal direction of Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, of Bishopsgate-street Within; by Messrs. Campbell, Smith, and Co. (Limited): Messrs. Edwards and Son supplying the heating apparatus, and the electric lighting work has been carried out by Mr. Herbert Nash, of Notting Hill-gate. The expense has been defrayed by a special subscription amongst the members of the congregation, about £50 still remaining to be subscribed.

Rushall, Wilts.—On Sunday, 22nd inst., the 195th anniversary of the General Baptist Chapel was commemorated, when sermons were preached by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, Senior Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly. The afternoon was devoted to harvest thanksgiving, and the evening was the anniversary of the chapel, the subject being "The Freedom of the Word of God." 2 Timothy ii. 9. The choir was assisted by half-a-dozen musicians with their instruments, led by a cornet. Eighty-five persons were present at this service, which was earnest and helpful. On Monday the Annual Trustees' Meeting was held at three o'clock, when the property was found in good preservation, and not as it was a few years ago. At five o'clock the annual tea was held, when as many as could be accommodated in chapel and vestry were present at the tables. The Sunday-school children also had tea as usual. Twelve friends from Trowbridge were also welcome visitors. After tea the public meeting was held, Mr. William Walker, J.P., of Trowbridge, in the chair, succeeding speakers being the Revs. J. Wain, Trowbridge, R. Moody, Bottlesford, and J. A. Brinkworth, and Mr. M. J. White, and J. Keates, the minister. The choir and musicians filled the gallery, the musicians with their instruments recalling the memory of former times, when religious worship was led by wind and stringed instruments in our country chapels. Mr. Brinkworth gave an account of the Court of Inquiry held at Upavon on March 29, at which the condition of the Trust was highly commended.

Torquay.—On Monday a social and business meeting took place in Unity Hall, when a much appreciated musical programme was rendered. The sale of fruit, flowers, and vegetables, for the benefit of the Poor Fund, following the harvest thanksgiving services of the previous day, realised 18s. 10d. The annual meeting of the Goodwill Society followed, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor presiding. The reports read showed a considerable amount of useful work accomplished during the last twelve months. The Committee was reduced in number from thirteen to eight members, and the Committee and officers elected for the next twelve months. A programme of work, arranged on the lines of last session, when each member read a paper on some subject of interest, was also adopted.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

READERS who intend being present at the meetings of the London and South Eastern Provincial Assembly on Tuesday, at Kensington—and we hope there are many such—are requested to make special note of the alterations in the times of the afternoon and evening items. It has been found necessary to make this series begin earlier than at first arranged. An advertisement in this issue gives the particulars.

WE are delighted to hear from Canon Rawnsley that the whole of the amount for which the National Trust asked to secure the purchase of the Brandlehow Estate, on the south-western shore of Derwentwater, has now been either received or promised. The challenge of "A Stroller," in the Spectator, was taken up by nine other donors of £100 each; and other gifts, both large and small, came from all parts of the British Isles. Thus this lovely bit of lake scenery is preserved for the free enjoyment of the people; and it is pleasant to think it has been done through the co-operation of so many friends. "It will be the part of the Trust," Miss Hill writes to the Spectator, "to preserve it (the lake shore) in its natural beauty, and to render it available to all who love Nature. I hope that a greater measure of support may, in the future, reach the National Trust, both for its regular work in securing open spaces, and for the lovely old buildings which it would be able to preserve were its ordinary funds larger. Every old building saved, every open space preserved, will be possession for those to whom the beauty of our English land is dear."

WHETHER it is the result of our recent Pentecostal meetings, or to some less obvious cause, it is certain that at Essex Hall of late there has been a remarkable influx of visitors from divers lands far and near, besides an increase in foreign correspondence. The situation is not without its difficulties, as readers may shrewdly guess; but it has its fascinating side also, and when there is genuine evidence of the longing for our gospel on the part of the people who sit in darkness abroad, it is suggestive that people sitting quite close at home may be in darkness too, or at least in twilight.

MR. ARTHUR HACKER'S kitcat portrait of Mr. David Martineau, which has been painted for presentation to that gentleman as a token of the admiration and esteem of his friends on the occasion of his retirement from the treasurership of the London District Unitarian Society, has been at Essex Hall on "private view" during the past day or two, and has been approved by all, so far as we know, as a fine picture and a capital likeness. The presentation, as at present arranged, will take place at the autumnal meeting of the Society which will be shortly announced. Meanwhile we believe it is still open to friends who have not subscribed to have that pleasure by writing to Mr. Hahnemann Epps (treasurer), 95, Upper Tulse Hill, S.W., and they will certainly be none the less willing to do so if they should call and see the portrait first.

THE Church Congress was opened at Brighton this week. The Bishop of Calcutta's opening sermon contained a rebuke and an encouragement—the rebuke being for those who forget to lay stress on what is really needful, and fight stiff battles over vestments, lights, and evening Communion; the encouragement for those who believe in the really Catholic Church. He said:—

> The Church is a great fact of the New Testament; but not so much is said in it about "the Church" as about "the Churches." The ideal which the New Testament pourtrays is that of the Church as constituted by the Churches. And that is the ideal which Christians will keep before their eyes. It would be wrong to exaggerate the signs of gradual union. To mistake the dawn for the noontide is to be unprepared for the noontide when it comes. I do not anticipate any strong movement for organic unity among Christian bodies in the new century. But it does appear to me probable that they will be drawn to a far deeper appreciation one of another. To that end I will contribute just one thought. It arises from the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. He is, as the text declares, "the Spirit of Truth." But the Spirit, like the wind, bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the voice thereof, but knowest not whence it cometh and whither it goeth."

Dr. Welldon proceeded to show how unfettered the Spirit is in respect to all other intellectual life—why should it be restricted in the religious life of mankind? So ask we.

REFERRING to the Bicentenary Celebrations at Mansfield, an interesting report of which is given in our columns this week, the Mansfield and North Notts Advertiser says:—"Epoch-marking anniversaries, like that which the Old Meeting House has been honouring, serve a good purpose in recalling great crises in our history, as the outcome of which national life has been refined and purified, and religious vigour quickened." If that is genuinely felt, even by the journalist, how much more it should be felt by the children and heirs of the men who stood up manfully in the crises of national history! But there needs more than the recalling which ends either in self-congratulation or pride of historical birth. The life of the nation never needed more than now to be refined and purified, or its religious vigour to be quickened. Let the sons be equal to their crisis as the fathers were.

THE week has been noteworthy in respect of the number of interesting archæological discoveries reported. Berlin authorities are satisfied that the audience chamber of King Nebuchadnezzar has been discovered at Babylon, with "well-preserved" wall-paintings and clay tablets said to contain psalms, along with others of a business character. A new and apparently very rich field of exploration has been successfully surveyed by Dr. Stein, acting for the Indian Government. It lies in the great Chinese Turkestan desert, where villages, some 2,000 years old, are buried in a mass of sand that has preserved a great number of valuable articles revealing a high state of culture. A huge number of wooden tablets, on which the writing is as fresh as if only a few weeks old and in a known Indian character, are among the finds. Nearer home, our friend Mr. Talfourd Ely announces the discovery of ruins of a vast Roman building, 50 yards by nearly 60, at Hayling Island, where he has spent some recent summers busy with the spade. He attributes the building to the end of the first Christian century. We congratulate him on his success. Other finds of the week are the reputed tools of the men who raised Stonehenge; a mighty "stegosaur" near Denver; and really good coal at Dover. What if the latter should alter the centre of gravity of commercial England?

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The opening address of the session was delivered in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, last Wednesday afternoon by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., the subject being, "The Story of the Targums." The President, Mr. James R. Beard, J.P., occupied the chair. Mr. Manning said that the Targums are Aramaic versions and paraphrases of parts of the Old Testament, made in Palestine for the benefit of the people when the Hebrew language began to fall into desuetude. Those we possess are all later than the time of Christ; but they represent traditional interpretations of the Old Testament from the time of Ezra, B.C. 458. Some are fairly literal translations of the Hebrew text; some are fanciful interpretations, embodying legends and myths, together with matter that is the product of pure imagination. In them we have an early illustration of the threefold method of interpretation of the Bible that has prevailed from earliest times until our own day—namely, (i.) translation, (ii.) paraphrase, (iii.) commentary. In them also we see illustrated the difficulties and dangers of all these modes of exegesis. Of literal translation in the Targums there is little enough, as compared with the immense mass of paraphrase. The general term Midrash, study or exposition, is used of all that early Hebrew literature expository of the Scriptures, to which the Targums themselves belong. The Midrash is said to have originated with "the men of the Great Synagogue," a council of scribes supposed to have been initiated by Ezra for the study and exposition of the Law.

Many critics are very doubtful whether such an institution as "the Great Synagogue" ever existed, and are inclined to believe that many things of unknown origin in the period between Ezra and the Maccabees were ascribed to them as the Law is ascribed to Moses, the Psalms to David, and all wisdom to Solomon. Doubtless the increased study of the law began in Ezra's time, and owed its impulse to him and his followers, who did what they could to fix the law as an authoritative guide to the people. Tradition magnified their work. Hence, in time, whatever there was in Jewish literature of unknown authorship, dealing with the exposition of the Bible text, was ascribed vaguely to "the men of the Great Synagogue." Deutsch says that "all the names and dates hitherto commonly attached to the Targums must be rejected." Yet we can say with certainty that they represent interpretations of the Old Testament text handed down from soon after the Captivity, and though they contain much later matter in abundance, the Targums introduce us to the earliest exposition of the Scripture with which we are acquainted.

It is said by some authorities that the Jews forgot their language during the Babylonian Captivity, and adopted the language of the people among whom they dwelt—namely, the Western Aramaic, sometimes incorrectly called Chaldee. The steady progress of this language in superseding the native tongue of Israel is a remarkable fact in their history, and it had important consequences. It had become the language of trade and commerce, and made very rapid progress after the exile. In the time of Jesus it was the common language of the people. He and his disciples spoke it. It is not correct to say, however, that the Jews forgot their Hebrew while in exile. They had kept themselves distinct, and had preserved their language amongst themselves. At the same time they could not have been entirely uninfluenced by their surroundings. All, except probably the most conservative, had acquired a knowledge of Aramaic, and used it in their daily business, &c. Many must have returned home bi-linguists. Later on, every fresh arrival from the land of Captivity must have brought children who spoke Aramaic with fluency.

Meantime in Palestine great changes had taken place. Aramaic was everywhere known. Mixed marriages were frequent, and Nehemiah (432 B.C.) saw, with alarm, that the children of these marriages "could not speak in the Jews' language." It is clear that at this time Aramaic had taken a permanent hold on the people, and the "holy tongue" was becoming less understood. Hence it was found necessary in the Synagogue, where the law was read in Hebrew as a sacred duty, to have an interpreter present to translate each verse as it was uttered by the Reader; and in process of time those who thus interpreted the law came to be a recognised official class, though apparently held in little respect. In their translations they were tempted to paraphrase, and to add more than the text warranted; and hence they were sometimes interrupted by expressions of dissent from those who understood the meaning of the Hebrew as well as, or perhaps better than, they. Rules were accordingly laid down for their guidance. In time a habit of free and expanded translation, or paraphrase, became common with these extemporaneous interpreters; and later still, the introduction of legend, allegory, and fable was a favourite mode of exegesis. Hence the Targums now extant are of different dates, and of varying character, some being more literal than others. The period during which they arose extends from the second to the twelfth century A.D. At first they were not put into writing. In time it was thought necessary to prevent deviations from the text, and bring about a greater uniformity of translations. In the second century apparently, it became not unusual to write down the translation—not for use in the Synagogue, for there the oral Targum alone was sanctioned; but with the object of restraining the vagaries of imaginative or ignorant interpreters. About the beginning of the fourth century A.D., an attempt was made in Babylon to fix Targumic text, which then assumed the character of an authorised version.

Mr. Manning next spoke of the various Targums, and gave illustrations of their treatment of the Hebrew text; and he further showed how far they may be made to serve a useful purpose in textual criticism. The address was of a most interesting character, and was listened to with marked attention by quite an average attendance of subscribers and friends.

At the conclusion of the meeting Principal Gordon announced that Mr. Henry Dawtrey, B.A., had been appointed Tate Scholar, and Mr. Simon Jones, Durning-Smith Scholar.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Two First Centuries of Florentine History, by Professor Pasquale Villari. Some years ago Mr. Fisher Unwin published in two volumes an English translation of Professor Villari's "Two First Centuries of Florentine History." The work was noticed in two successive numbers of The Inquirer, and attention was called to the high importance of Professor Villari's researches. The second volume contained, at the end, the text of a thirteenth-century Florentine Chronicle. The whole of the English portion of this work is now reproduced in one volume, for which English students of Florentine history cannot be too grateful. It brings within their reach what is practically the one and only book from which they can gain a coherent conception of the development of the Florentine Republic, and the meaning of the Guelph and Gibbeline disputes. We have examined several passages of the translation, which in our former notices we criticised as incorrect or misleading, and we have found, in every case, that the new issue has the passages correctly rendered. It is evident, therefore, that care has been bestowed on the revision. It seems strange that there is no indication on the title-page that this is a re-issue of the larger work. (Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

P. H. W.

Mr. Epictetus, Jr., in his Common Sense Philosophy for the Conduct of Life, disarms criticism, and leaves us to make the best we can of the style of his book. The author, Mr. Benjamin Walker, we recognise as a devoted worker among the poor in Manchester, and his portrait faces the Preface, if we should be inclined to forget. To learn to bear and forbear is the great principle of this our latest philosopher, and we may learn other good things from his book. We come nearest to him, perhaps, in the following passage:—

Many years ago the angel of death took a beloved child away from my hearth, and religion failed to comfort me as it had done previously. My faith in God, and in His everlasting goodness and love, was at a very low ebb then—and it seemed as if the tide of the Spirit would never advance and rise again. However, I found reconciliation and consolation, not in the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures—not in the usual "means of Grace"—not in the words of any preacher, neither in the lives of the Saints—but in the Enchiridion of Epictetus: "Made English, in a Poetical Paraphrase," by Ellis Walker, M.A., about the year 1691. Whether it was the novelty of the thoughts in the book, which just suited my special needs at the moment, I do not know, but the philosophy I learned there did for my soul what conventional religion had failed to do.

What religion that is not conventional has since done for Mr. Walker readers may partly see from his book, and also in what curious fashion he expounds the wholesome teaching of his philosophy. (John Heywood, Deansgate, Manchester. 3s. 6d.).

In this week's M.A.P., Mr. T. P. O'Connor, in an account of "Schools of my Childhood," repeats his impressions of Father Rudolph Suffield, afterwards Unitarian minister. The story, though not new, is pathetically told, and probably there are many readers who will be glad of this reference to Mr. O'Connor's article.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY UNITARIANISM.

BY THE REV. FRANK WALTERS.

I.

I SHALL, at once, plunge into my subject, without any apologies, introductions, or explanations. And, first of all, I believe that the Unitarianism of the twentieth century will be Unitarian. You say that is a truism; but, nevertheless, it needs stating. For, of late, I have met with certain arguments which seem to indicate that we have been Unitarians quite long enough, and that now it is time for us to resolve our definite theological propaganda into friendly associations of kindred churches. Such associations are most desirable and useful; and I wish them God-speed. I have the profoundest sympathy with every attempt to secure a spiritual fellowship which shall transcend all theological differences and ecclesiastical limitations. And more urgently than any other community have Unitarians striven for such a unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. But, while the promotion of broad Christian fellowship is a duty and privilege, it is also a duty and privilege to affirmand propagate what we consider to be the purest form of Christian faith. For example, it is an excellent thing to have a Triennial Conference, which includes many churches that have never avowed themselves Unitarian; and, certainly, the variety of religious sentiment expressed from its platform emphasises the fact of the inclusive spirit which animates that institution. But the Triennial Conference can never take the place and do the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which finds the reason of its existence in the propaganda of that form of religion that is called Unitarian. In the same way, it is excellent that clusters of churches should be formed into provincial assemblies, for mutual help and service, without the adoption of any theological name; for such unions affirm the solemn truth that there is a Church of the Spirit, which includes all the narrow folds into which the flock of the Good Shepherd has been divided. In this North Eastern Province, I should most heartily welcome any scheme by which our scattered churches could be more closely affiliated; and it would be an intense pleasure to welcome into our union any congregation other than Unitarian that felt drawn to us by the freedom of our faith. But I should also most strongly resist any movement which tended in any way to eliminate the definite theological principle for which this Association stands. Like the British and Foreign Association, we exist to affirm those truths of religion included under the Unitarian name. And to transform a "Unitarian Christian Association for Missionary Purposes" into a Provincial Assembly of Churches would be to emasculate its function and to abolish the very principle upon which our mission is founded.

In view, then, of certain tendencies to disparage our theological enterprise, I want to make it clear that our Unitarianism of the twentieth century must be as firm in its protest and as solemn in its affirmation as was the Unitarianism of the last hundred years. We must not allow a superficial estimate of the religious situation to make us imagine that our protest and affirmation are no longer needed. I am told that the Westminster Confession and the Thirty-nine Articles are generally regarded as curious survivals of the past. I answer, that subscription to these documents is made a condition of the Christian ministry in the Presbyterian and Anglican Churches — and, surely, we are not asked to regard such a solemn deed of subscription as merely an orthodox pose and not as a personal profession! It is commonly reported that the doctrine of the Tri-personality of God is now so greatly modified by a more subtle metaphysic as scarcely to present any difficulty to the Christian Theist. It may be so; but I know that the Athanasian Creed is still read at our national altars, and its denial is threatened with everlasting punishment. It is a matter of frequent remark that the dogma of Everlasting Punishment is dying out of Christian faith. But, I believe I am only stating a fact, when I say that any Wesleyan minister who publicly denied that dogma would be unfrocked and excommunicated. I continually hear about the wonderful breadth of thought which characterises the Congregational ministry. Well, it seems only the other day that I was reading the new Evangelical Catechism; and, certainly, if that document represents the present theological stage of English Nonconformity, the need for twentieth-century Unitarian enterprise is most urgent and imperative. Time will not permit me to give further proof that our work is not done, that, certainly during the portion of the century that may be allotted to the youngest of us, the old protest must be made against those theological creeds which confuse the spiritual worship of the One Father, which disguise the natural beauty of Christ's humanity, and distort the simplicity of the Gospel by apocalyptic dramas and scholastic schemes.

II.

And that protest, I am convinced, can be most effectually made by means of an unflinching affirmation of our Unitarian Faith. As the years of the twentieth century roll on, it will be found that our gospel is that for which the world is waiting—the very form of religion most adapted to modern needs. For, though we still employ the word in the old sense to emphasise the personal unity of God, yet there can be no question that, during the last fifty years, the connotations of Unitarianism have swept beyond its early theological limits; and now our Unitarian Churches stand for the unity of Creation, that cosmic order which is only another name for the unchangeableness and fidelity of the Creator; we stand for the unity of man, the organic solidarity of the race; we stand for the homogeneity of truth, the authority of conscience, the validity of reason. This, then, is the Unitarianism which we regard as a prophecy of the Church of the future. Instead of being a mere sect, cut off from other departments of life and thought, our Church is based upon the ages of human experience; it allies itself to every new expansion of knowledge; and it accepts the normal evolution of humanity as its source of divine revelation. Our Faith is one grand affirmation from beginning to end. We believe—we believe in the absolute love of God, in His universal and unchanging Fatherhood. We believe — we believe that, with all its tragedies of suffering and sin, the history of the world is the record of the Rise of Man from animal impulses into spiritual vision. We believe—we believe that this sweep of human progress will not be arrested by death, that Immortality is the name for the soul's endless growth into divine perfection. That is what we stand for—the sublime affirmation of the absolute goodness of God and the everlasting perfectability of man.

And so, with a vaster wealth of meaning in the word, we still continue to speak of our Unitarian faith. Twentieth-century Unitarianism in a deeper sense than ever will be Unitarian.

III.

I believe that in maintaining this affirmative Unitarianism, we shall still find it an immense advantage to trace back the genesis of our faith to the finest teachings of the Bible, and especially to the Christianity of Christ himself. To us the Bible is no infallible oracle or authoritative guide; but, even regarding it as a purely human document, it is of profound interest to discover that ours is the faith which inspired ancient prophets, glowed in the souls of psalmists and seers, flashed up into clearest vision in the mind of Jesus, and animated the first missionaries of Christianity to carry their message to the world. Still we maintain that supreme truth of the unity of God which, like a golden thread, runs through all the strange, tangled course of Jewish history. Still we bow our heads and say amen to the watchword of Moses—"Hear, oh Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord"; still we respond to that mighty utterance —"God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth"; still we echo the great saying of Paul—"To us there is but one God, even the Father." Whatever other criticism may be passed on Trinitarian theology, more convinced are we than ever that it can find no adequate basis in Scripture. Indeed, I am sometimes surprised that, after twenty years' experience of the Revised Version, people have so feebly realised the serious modifications in Christian theology which this new translation involves. With the Revised Version in our hands, with all the results of Higher Criticism at our disposal, in a larger comprehension of the meaning of Scripture and the teaching of Jesus, twentieth-century Unitarianism may be described as Biblical and Christian.

IV.

At the same time there are many indications that, during this century ancient Scripture and historical Christianity will undergo a more drastic criticism than any to which they have been subjected in the past. These criticisms, together with what are regarded as the aggressive tendencies of physical science, arouse in timid believers an exceeding dread of some fatal catastrophe to religion itself. And I am not surprised at the apprehension. Certainly some recent criticisms of the Bible have been of a most radical character, and are all the more remarkable, because they have apparently received the sanction of distinguished scholars who hold their posts in virtue of their subscription to orthodox creeds. For example, Canon Cheyne, as an Anglican clergyman, occupies the position of Oriel Professor of Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, and in the latest volume of his Encyclopædia Biblica one of the contributors goes so far as to say that there are only five passages in the whole of the Gospels which enable us "to prove to a sceptic that there is any historical value to be assigned to the Gospels"; and he goes on to assert that, from the evidence of these passages, "in the person of Jesus we have to do with a completely human being, and that the divine is to be sought in him only in the form in which it is capable of being found in man." And yet after reading that passage, members of the National Church are expected to join in a form of worship in which Jesus is worshipped as "very God of very God." I will not venture, after a statement like that, to prophesy what may be the further developments of the Higher Criticism. Neither will I attempt to forecast the influence upon religious thought of the movements of scientific discovery. But I will say, with an absolute conviction, that whatever these results may be, the citadel of spiritual faith will abide, sound, strong, secure as ever, with its foundations based upon the primary facts of human nature, with its bulwarks rising above desolating storms and darkest clouds, bathed in the serene, unsullied radiance of the eternal heaven. That, I take it, is the Everlasting Gospel which Twentieth-Century Unitarianism is specially called to proclaim with unwavering fidelity and persistent assurance. The faith that is based on the supernatural origin of a book must suffer frightful loss, when that book is resolved into a human document, characterised by errors of evidence, changes of opinion, outbursts of passion, and fallibility of thought; the religion that finds its authority in a book must share the fortunes of its scriptures, when they are rent asunder by higher criticism and invalidated by new scholarship. The faith that is based upon the divine prerogative of a church must inevitably perish, when that Church has its place assigned to it amongst the many institutions in which, for seasons, men have embodied their desires and aspirations, when it appears, henceforth, as only one of those phenomena of religious history which have their day and cease to be. But, in comparison with these biblical and ecclesiastical foundations, we may surely boast that our Unitarian Church is based upon a rock, and that the gates of hell can never prevail against it. I can imagine a time when the sanctions of the Protestant Bible and the Catholic Church shall have perished, when not one believer can be found in the inspiration of the one or in the infallibility of the other. But by no stretch of imagination am I able to conceive of a time when the words God, Duty, Immortality will be for ever emptied of their meaning, when all men will agree to regard themselves as cunning casts of clay, when consciousness will be universally regarded as a phosphorescent spark upon the dark tides of a fatalistic ocean, when Love will be defined as glorified animalism, and Duty dissolved into an organised trick and a useful habit. Science and criticism may explain many problems in nature and history—they may, perchance, seriously modify our views of physical processes and human institutions; but they can never explain away the primal facts of that Conscious Soul, by whose intellectual vision those processes are recognised, and from whose spiritual energies those institutions arise as majestic symbols of its unquenchable worship, its unconquerable hope. No interpretation of its objects can ever dissolve consciousness itself into one of the phenomena of time; no formula of its historical development can ever invalidate that religious experience whereby we realise a divine presence and an immortal destiny. All verified results of historical criticism and physical science will at once be accepted by the Unitarians of the twentieth century, even though they threaten to revolutionise preconceived notions of natural law and Christian tradition; for there is one characteristic of our faith that specially wins my admiration—it never fears to face the reality of things, it trusts truth all the way, it never tries to believe the unbelievable, it never poses as the advocate of discredited theories, it has no apprehension lest God Almighty's facts should turn out to be undesirable in the shaping of life and conduct. We fling open the hospitable doors to every truth, however unexpected the shape in which it seeks admission into the temple of knowledge; and it is impossible for us to believe that any truth can quench our faith in the reality of the Soul that thinks it, or can dash our reverence for that Eternal Mind, from whom it comes as a single beam in the endless apocalypse of uncreated light. These are the adamantine realities for which twentieth-century Unitarianism must stand; and, holding resolutely by such an invincible faith, we may, indeed, exercise the splendid audacity of spiritual zeal. They may call it a sectarian symbol, a theological ticket, if they choose; but to us Unitarianism is that Faith which stands four-square against every pessimistic prophecy; it values the Bible, but does not bind up its destinies with even the most sacred literature; it reverences Jesus, but declines to identify religion with any isolated events of history; it regards with profound pathos the long procession of the generations, as they seek to realise their worship in sacramental institutions, but it cannot recognise even the most venerable Church as a final resting place for the seeking soul. The religion that shall survive the removing of those thing that are shaken must be "lofty as the love of God, and ample as the wants of man."

To such a faith, as we enter upon this new century, do we devote and consecrate ourselves—a faith that, in its essential elements, can never be outworn, can never be surpassed; for ours is faith in the authority of conscience, the supremacy of reason, the validity of the soul; and its universal Gospel is the eternal Fatherhood of God and the indissoluble Brotherhood of Man.

Country Holiday Movement.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House-chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Griffiths, £2 2s. (second donation); Miss E. Garrett, £1; Mrs. Bryan Johnson, 10s.; Mr. Crauford (New Zealand), 2s. As 120 more children have been sent away this year than in 1900 funds are still earnestly solicited.

THE MEDIÆVAL CHRONICLER IN ENGLAND.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

II.

Chronicle Writing.

As I have reminded you, there was a pause in our history-writing after the desolation of Stephen's wars, from about 1154 to 1170. Then, however, came an unprecedented "outburst of historical industry" in the north and the south and on the western borders.

Northumbrian Writers.

Northumbria, as of old, took the lead. The spirit of Baeda still lived in its wasted valleys and villages. Monks reclaimed the land, and restored learning. The Cistercians, the one religious order in which an Englishman had a hand in founding, were welcomed to the North of England in 1132 by Walter Espec, who gave them a piece of forest in the valley of the Rye, called by them Rievaulx. Through the Civil War the Cistercians at Rievaulx and other places worked on quietly, living their life "according to reason," abstemious and contemplative, rising with the sun and never using a candle, and changed the wilderness about them into a fruitful field. One of them was the saintly Aelred, of Rievaulx, who has a place among our minor chroniclers. Not far from Rievaulx was a branch of the Cistercian monastery at Byland; and near Byland was the Augustinian priory of Newburgh, the home of William of Newburgh.

William of Newburgh.

William was a level-headed little Yorkshireman, who spent nearly all his life in his priory, and heard much, though did not believe all he heard, from travellers, sometimes men of importance, on their way between London and Scotland. He was born in 1136, the second year of Stephen, and died in 1198, the last year but one of Richard Cœur de Lion; and in, or shortly before, 1196, when his health was failing, he wrote, at the request of the Abbot of Rievaulx, a history of England during his life — Historia Rerum Anglicarum. I shall refer to an important event recorded by him later on. Here I will only draw your attention to his account of an Anti-Semite campaign early in Richard's reign, when crusading zeal found a convenient object at home in the royal money-lenders. In the neighbouring city of York the Jews, when attacked, fled, as was their custom, for the King's protection in the castle. The governor, on his return to the castle from some business in the city, found himself shut out by the terrified refugees, and in a wild moment ordered an assault. For three days the infuriated populace besieged the place, led by a hermit in a white frock, who cried "Down with the enemies of Christ," and assisted with his own hands in pushing forward the battering engines, but, approaching too near the walls, was crushed to death by a stone. In despair, the chief Jews, at the instigation of their rabbi, "a mad old man," as William called him, set fire to the building, threw their treasure into the flames, and killed first their wives and children and then themselves. The remainder, preferring "to trust themselves to Christian mercy" and Christian promises, were put to the sword.

The persecution of the Jews, as of the Albigenses within the fold, was one of the dark and terrible evils of the time, though explicable enough when Christendom was gathering itself together in passionate union against Saracen and Turk.

Roger of Howden.

On the other side of York was the village which gave its name to William of Newburgh's contemporary historian, Roger of Howden. We must think of William and Roger as writing about the same time, independently, in different parts of Yorkshire, and dying within two or three years of each other. The laborious researches of Dr. Stubbs have revealed that Howden's Chronica contains "the full harvest of the Northumbrian histories" between Baeda and William of Newburgh, including a revision and continuation of Simeon of Durham's Historia Regum and the Chronicle of Melrose. For the years 1192–1201 it is original and full, perhaps even more valuable than William of Newburgh's Historia. As a clerk in the service of Henry II., in France and Scotland as well as in England, he had had intercourse with public men and access to documents beyond the reach of William. His book affords the best evidence of the close relationship between England and the Continent in the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. We read of papal and imperial conflicts, Court alliances, crusading adventures, town and gown riots in Paris. Foreign state-papers are numerous and valuable. The stories of the Pope Celestine kicking the crown from the head of the Emperor Henry in 1191, and of Richard's submission for his kingdom to the same Emperor in 1193, if not very trustworthy, are interesting in the light of the conception then growing up, and afterwards developed by Dante, of the dual authority in Christendom of Pope and Emperor. We are moving on now towards the era so grandly gathered up in the "Divine Comedy." Francis of Assisi and Dominic are both alive, one a boy of eleven, in 1193, the other a young man of three and twenty. They had their forerunners. In Howden's Chronica we read of a Frankish priest, named Fulk, whose public preaching "brought even harlots to the Lord, and led usurers, by the sight of heavenly treasure, to distribute their wealth for the use of the poor." He boldly appeared before the Cœur de Lion, and bade him as soon as possible give away in marriage his three shameless daughters lest a worse evil might befall him. "Liar," cried Richard, "I have no daughters." "Yea," replied Fulk, "three most scandalous ones, of whom the first is Pride, the second Avarice, and the third Lechery." To which the King answered scornfully, "I will give them away then—my Pride to the Knights Templars, my Avarice to the Cistercians, and my Lechery to the Prelates of the Church." A disciple of Fulk, Eustace of Flaye, came to England early in John's reign, in 1201, and "preached the word of the Lord from city to city," as far as Wakefield and York, denouncing the desecration of the Sabbath.

London Writers.

Let us now go from Northumbria to London, where we shall meet with other reformers. One of Howden's sources of information in his Chronica was an important contemporary record, Gesta Regis Henrici et Ricardi, which has been ascribed with probability to a Londoner, but doubtfully to Richard FitzNeal, Bishop of London from the first year to the last but one of the reign of Richard.

The Gesta Regis Henrici et Ricardi.

Whoever the writer was, he knew the Court and foreign politics, had private intelligence of the progress of the King's expedition in the East, and was acquainted with doings in London. From him we have an account of the ruffianism in the London streets of a gang of twelfth-century Mohocks, probably young Norman bloods, who insulted and wounded the citizens and committed daring robberies. One night attacking the stone dwelling of a well-to-do burger, they met with a warm reception. The householder, with his friends, dashed out of a dark corner upon the ringleader, one Dick Buckwint, and cut off his hand; and next day he marched him before the magistrates. To save his life, Buckwint betrayed his accomplices, among whom was a man of rank, Old John—apparently a fore-runner of Sir John Falstaff. This ancient good-for-nothing was tried by the ordeal of water and hanged. Taking advantage of Richard's absence and the quarrel between Longchamp and Prince John, the English element in London obtained municipal rights and established a communia, which Norman bishop and Norman baron would have to recognise, and which, as Richard of Devizes remarked, "the King or his father, Henry II., would not have granted for a thousand thousand marks of silver." What evils might come of it, he said, sarcastically, was indicated in the definition of the word communia, which meant "tumor plebis, timor regni, tepor sacerdotii—swelling in the common-folk, terror in the Kingdom, a warm time among the clergy."

Ralph de Diceto.

Five years later, in 1196, the "good dean" of St. Paul's, Ralph Dicey (as I will venture to Anglicise Ralph de Diceto), author of Imagines Historiarum, a scholarly and gentle old man, was an eye-witness of a tumult, in his own beloved cathedral, excited by William Longbeard. As his account of the matter, while not unsympathetic with the people, is rather unfair, as history nearly always is, towards the agitator, I will endeavour to gather the facts from the less prejudiced, but by no means unprejudiced, report which reached William of Newburgh a few days, if I understand him aright, after the occurrence. William FitzOsbert had been a crusader, and was now a lawyer in London, a man of "quick wit, fairly learned, and an eloquent speaker," conspicuous at meetings of the citizens for his denunciation of the Norman nobles and officials, and for his long English beard which he wore in defiance of Norman fashion. He pleaded for justice in the levy and administration of the taxes, was elected an alderman, had the right of petitioning the King on the people's behalf, and was attended by a guard of the burgers. Fifty-two thousand names—certainly an exaggeration—were appended to his requisition. He had the zeal of Fulk and Eustace. Taking a text from Isaiah xii. 3, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation," he said, in prophetic language, "A Saviour of the poor do I come. Ye are the poor ones, who have felt the hard hand of the rich. Drink from my wells the waters of the teaching of deliverance, and have joy, for the time draws near of your visitation. I will divide the waters from the waters. The waters are the people. I will divide the people who are lowly and faithful from the people who are proud and false: I will divide the chosen from the guilty, as the light from the darkness." The archbishop, afraid to arrest him in public, sent armed men to take him secretly. Snatching an axe from one of them he struck him dead, and escaped to Bow church with his wife and a few followers. He was burnt out, and stabbed at the church-door by the son of the man he had killed; and then, drawn asunder by horses, his body was hung on a gibbet at Tyburn, with the bodies of nine others who had refused to desert him. After his death the people called him a martyr, and scraped away the earth, on which his blood had fallen beneath the gibbet, as sacred, to "the depth of a good-sized ditch."

DR. WESTCOTT.

AN APPRECIATION.

THERE is a good deal of popular impatience of the scholar and specialist when he happens to be a theologian. We do more than tolerate him in medicine and other branches of applied science, for we can measure his usefulness in curing disease or adding to the material comforts of life. But it is harder to apply a test of this kind to the theologian. It is felt, and with truth, that we can love God and have the graces of the Christian character without the aid of his special studies; and the superficial conclusion is too often drawn that we can accordingly do without him altogether. He may, if he wishes to do so, pursue his dry studies unhindered; but it is unreasonable to expect the layman to pay any attention to him or even to regard him as a worker for the common good. Every great branch of study has its scholastic and antiquarian side which in the nature of things can have little interest or attraction for the great mass of men. Theology is not exempt. It provides many hobbies, some of them exceedingly curious, for the specialist. But the chief strength of modern theological study is not given to these things at all, but to the vital interests of religion. It must not be forgotten that religion is something more than a feeling of love and worship in the individual soul. It is a divine force in the world with a history which carries us back to the dawn of human intelligence. Christ lives not only in the heart of the believer, but also in Scripture, in the Church, and in the great societies of men which have been moulded by his ideas and owed allegiance to his spirit. It is the business of the theologian to give himself to the study of these things, to try to separate the true and the false, fact and tradition in religious history; to study Scripture with the minute verbal accuracy which forces it to yield its literal meaning to the reader; to trace the growth and development of thought and corporate activity under the guidance of the Christian spirit, and to bring them so far as possible to the test of truth and reality; and in these ways to minister to a deeper knowledge of revelation and life. But just as there are many people who talk glibly about evolution, while they pay little respect to the long toil of special study and experiment which made that great generalisation possible; so we grow familiar with the more inspiring view of the Bible, or with the real meaning of the words of Christ for individual and social life, which is becoming rapidly the common property of all educated people, but the men who have made this wider vision of the truth, this closer grip upon the realities of Christian teaching possible, receive from us, as a rule, a very limited appreciation.

Among the great scholars of our time Dr. Westcott has been conspicuous for the combination of two qualities which are seldom found in such perfect harmony. He has consistently practised himself and taught to others the duty of industry, patience, and attention to details as the only method by which the truth can be wooed and won. But, on the other hand, the truth which he discovers is always full of great meanings for the souls of men. He pursues it so eagerly because he is sure that it contains healing for the world's sorrow and sin. His life of study is dominated by an intense religious enthusiasm. In him the service of Truth, cold, passionless, severe, is transfigured into the glorious freedom of discipleship to a living Lord. It kept him from censoriousness and pride, the besetting sins of the critical intellect when it is divorced from spiritual affections and aims, and it gave to his character an almost childlike humbleness and simplicity, one of the most winning traits of the great student and thinker who lives in converse with the Infinite.

For the events of his life a passing reference will suffice. Born in Birmingham in 1825, he passed from King Edward the Sixth's Grammar School to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a brilliant degree in 1848. For seventeen years he was an assistant master at Harrow, returning to Cambridge in 1870, as Regius Professor of Divinity. This was the position which his special gifts best qualified him to fill, and for twenty years he gave himself with untiring zeal to the work of theological teaching and research. During part of this time he had as colleagues Lightfoot and Hort, a trio of remarkable scholars of altogether exceptional brilliancy. In 1879 Lightfoot was raised to the See of Durham, and upon the latter's death, ten years later, Westcott was appointed to succeed him in this great position.

It is, however, in the work which he accomplished with extraordinary concentration of purpose that the chief interest of his life is to be found. His name will be always associated with that of his friend Hort in connection with the revision of the text of the Greek Testament. It was a task of immense labour. Begun in 1853, it was only in 1881, twenty-eight years later, that the volumes were issued from the press. English scholarship can show nothing comparable to it in recent times. The result has been, in spite of many points which are still in dispute, that we have a text of the New Testament writings more accurate, much clearer of later additions and corruptions than we possessed before. A revised text of this kind was the indispensable preliminary to any useful work being undertaken upon the revision of the authorised version of the New Testament in order to bring it into closer accord with the original. The Westcott-Hort text is not the same in all details as that used by the New Testament revisers, but its influence was very great; and Westcott himself was one of the leading textual authorities on the committee of revision. Of the value of the Revised Version he had a very high opinion. He believed that it had brought "the words and thoughts of the Apostles before English people with a purity and exactness never attained before." To this purity and exactness his own labour contributed in a surpassing degree. The minute care for the accuracy of the text and the precise meaning of words was to him something far more than technical scholarship. It was the only way of piercing to the exact meaning of the Christian revelation. This may be made clear by a passage from an address which he delivered in the Convocation of York in reply to an attack upon what some people had called the "trivialities" of the Revised Version. "Is it," he asks, "a matter of indifference whether we say 'the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus' or 'through Christ Jesus'? To me, I confess, it makes a fundamental difference in the whole conception of Christianity whether we regard life as something which Christ has won for us apart from Himself, or something which is absolutely bound up with Himself, and only realised in vital fellowship with Him. And I shall hold ten years of my life well spent if I have been enabled to help in any degree in bringing this thought home to English-speaking people in years to come." It is worth while to linger for a few moments over these questions of detail, for they show how the work of the great scholar, in some of its aspects so technical and remote from ordinary interests, is of real use to men, and has a distinct bearing upon practical questions of Christian conduct and belief.

Dr. Westcott's work on the New Testament, however, was not confined to the revision of the text. He is among the few great modern expositors. His commentaries on the Epistles of St. John, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Gospel according to St. John are remarkable contributions to Biblical learning. They are pervaded by his spirit of stern accuracy, his determination to wrest the exact meaning from words, but he is at the same time in close sympathy with the spiritual meaning, sensitive to the depth and richness of the religious ideas, which it is the highest work of the commentator to discover and explain. To him the New Testament in all its parts is chiefly a Word of power and a Vision of Life.

I must not attempt to speak in the present article of the practical side of Dr. Westcott's activity after he became Bishop of Durham. It was in its way almost equally great. It appeals, however, more directly to the imagination, and is more easily understood than his work as a scholar. It would hardly be true to say that he was ever a popular teacher. His influence spread like that of Frederick Denison Maurice, with whom in some aspects of his thought he has much affinity, through the few who could follow him a long the strait paths of learning and up the difficult heights of far-stretching vision. But he had great practical wisdom and mental alertness, and he was a really successful bishop. He won his way to the hearts of the Durham miners. He grappled bravely and with uncompromising hopefulness with the social and industrial problems of our time. By his sagacity and personal force of character he settled the terrible coal strike of 1892.

He was not in any sense a party man. He had too much breadth of view to wear a label of Broad, or Low, or High. He believed in a progressive and enlarging interpretation of the meaning of Christianity through experience. He saw how the Gospel had entered into possession of new territories through the economic changes in society. He welcomed the awakening of a social conscience and the preaching of a social gospel. For such a mind there could be no finality. "As long as human knowledge grows it cannot be affirmed that the last word of the Spirit has been spoken. As long as men are able to gain further insight into themselves or into the world, the age of Revelation is not closed;"—it is the prophet of Christian idealism who speaks to us in words like these. "Unattainable ideals," he has told us elsewhere, "are the guiding stars of life. They convert movement into progress. If we acknowledge them they fix our goal, and enable us to strain towards it with undistracted and unvested effort." The total sum of his work was great, and its value is permanent, and the secret of it lay in his superb moral concentration of purpose not less than in his exceptional gifts. His early aim, clearly conceived and felt to be worthy the highest human powers, was to win for men a stronger grasp of Christian Truth and a larger vision of Christian Duty, and he gave his life to this task "with undistracted and unwasted effort."

Twentieth Century Celebration at Newcastle.—The Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association held its annual meetings, Oct. 2, at the Church of the Divine Unity, New Bridge-street, Newcastle. Following the business meeting, at which Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., presided, a conference was held, at which the Rev. Frank Walters read the paper on "Twentieth Century Unitarianism," which is printed in another part of this issue. After tea an organ recital was given by Mr. J. E. Chapman, and subsequently a public meeting was held, when Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. (President B. and F.U.A.), the Rev. J. Forrest, and other friends gave addresses. We reserve detailed report till next week.

Ministers' Superannuation Fund.—At a social meeting of the congregation at Stoke Newington-green, held on Tuesday evening last, the subject of this Fund was considered, and its desirableness strongly enforced by Mr. Howard Young, Mr. F. W. Turner, and others, and supported by the Rev. W. Wooding, who said that, although he would be unable, owing to age, to take advantage of the opportunity offered by this scheme, he felt that it would be of great value to the younger ministers. It was thereupon resolved, nem. con., that a congregational subscription for this Fund be issued, and by unanimous request Mrs. Wooding agreed to undertake this work.

THAT OUTSPOKEN SERMON.

Sir,—"To my amazement, my surprise," my attention has been drawn to your criticism of two or three weeks ago, on my sermon on "Anarchism and Modern Perils," delivered in Christ Church, Devonport. Your comments seemed to me as savage as a meat-axe, and I felt "cut up" to the fineness of sausage meat.

My sermon was only half reported, and the other half might have merited your commendation, ere you sat down on me so heavily, could you have read it. Alas! that you did not. Now that I am flattened out by you—though much praised by others—let me lift up my "diminished head" and say a word. You are "Christian" and fair enough for this, I am confident.

Surely you do not mean to apologise for regicides or assassins, nor to represent Unitarians as holding that such creatures ought not to be severely dealt with, along with all rebels, outlaws and traitors. If such sentiments as mine regarding these are "un-Christian," I prefer to be a Pagan. E. B. Russell.

The National Unitarian Temperance Association will be represented at the Autumnal Conference of the United Kingdom Band of Hope Union at Belfast next week by its Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. A. Edwards, F.R.G.S., who is to address an afternoon conference of ministers, Sunday-school teachers and others in the York-street Non-Subscribing Presbyterian (Unitarian Church), and a public evening meeting in the Minor Y.M.C.A. Hall, Wellington-place, Belfast, to-day (Friday, Oct. 4). Miss Ada M. Sale, of Northampton, will also take part in these meetings, and at the conference will read a paper entitled "Hints from a Fellow-Worker."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Perhaps you have read or heard stories of the terrible persecutions which people used to suffer long ago for their religion, or for what they thought true and right in other ways; and I am sure you have thought how cruel it was of those who persecuted them, and how glad you are to live now, when things are so much better than then. And you are quite right in thinking so; but there still are persecutions, and in some of them children are very apt to take a part.

Boys and girls laugh at their schoolfellows and companions, thoughtlessly—but sometimes cruelly. It may be very silly to mind being laughed at, and we ought all to learn to bear it cheerfully; and if we can join in the laugh ourselves, so much the better.

But is it not really cruel to laugh and tease all the more because we see that our companion is hurt or made unhappy? Yet this is what we often do. First we laugh at him, and then when his face grows red and his eyes fill with tears, we call out, "Look at him! he's going to cry!" Is there no boy or girl generous and loving enough to go up to him and say, "Never mind, old fellow, we'll go together—they shall laugh at us both"? Who does not know what a difference that would make, and how the loneliness would be all gone out of life at once?

We can make all this difference to a companion, and we do not do it? Are we, then, so hard-hearted?

No, we are only very thoughtless; we never thought of it in this way before. It was only fun, and we did not really mean seriously to make our companion's life a burden to him.

A little boy was the only child of a very poor widow; she could scarcely earn enough for them to live on; but she was determined that whatever happened her boy should go to school, and be taught all that she could possibly afford. She worked out all day long, and in the evenings she used to mend the clothes and put the room tidy, and do all that she could to make a little home for herself and her boy. His clothes got dreadfully shabby and ragged, and she could not afford any money to buy new ones; but one thing she thought she might do; she took her own Sunday dress and cut it up into a jacket and trousers for Bob. She was not a clever needlewoman, and could neither work nor fit things well; but she worked away to get the things finished that Bob might go to school on Monday, tidy and neat. And the clothes were done, and Bob had watched them being made with the greatest interest. He thought they would be lovely, only he felt very sorry for his mother's Sunday dress, especially when he saw all the nice pieces that were left, and which yet were too small to make anything for her.

When Monday morning came, it would be hard to say who was happiest or proudest, Bob or his mother, as he trudged off to school with a shining sunny little face, his hair neatly combed, and his satchell on his back. He felt as if everyone must be looking at his new clothes and envying him. It is true, the clothes were all plaid—a green and blue plaid; but Bob always thought his mother's dress lovely, and so of course when it became jacket and trousers it was lovely too.

But no sooner did he get to school than his joy was turned into sorrow. Some of the boys caught him, and turned him about, and teased and laughed at him. They found out that the clothes did not fit well; they asked who was his tailor; they called him "old chess-board," and asked him at which pawnshop he had bought his clothes; and they insulted him till the poor boy was half-wild with anger and misery. He cried and sobbed, he hit out and stamped, and tried to get away. And the more he cried and the more angry he was the more they bullied him; and his poor little heart was almost breaking as he thought of his mother's Sunday dress, and the long hours that she had sat up to make him tidy. He felt as if he were all alone in the world; yet no—he had his dear mother, whom he loved better than ever.

Then one thought came into his mind: he would never let her know what had happened. And that seemed to give him strength; he swallowed his misery and dried his eyes; he would be brave, and would never be made to think ill of the clothes she had made for him.

After a while he could bear the boys' mockery and laughter, and he even now and then made a little joke himself about the squares on his plaid clothes. But he kept his secret, and never told anyone what his jacket and trousers had been before; nor did he ever tell his mother of the persecution which they brought upon him.

If you think about it and learn what made people different from others, you will often find that there is a story behind the oddness which you laugh at, which would make the laughter seem to you much worse than foolish, if you knew the story. There was such a story, you see, behind the boy's plaid clothes.

We often do not think how much real happiness we might give to someone by a kind word, instead of laughter and teasing.

A very little boy, about four years old, was out walking in the street with his mother, and they met a very tiny little woman, quite a dwarf in size; and as they passed her the little boy looked at her, and said to his mother, "Oh, mother, what a sweet little woman!" The little woman's face brightened with a smile, and she said, "Thank you, my dear; it is a long time since I heard anything like that."

Remember then, dear children, never to be unkind or inconsiderate to people whom you think odd, but try and learn their story, or imagine to yourself what it may be; and think that they may have much to bear and to suffer, without unkindness, from you. You need not wait to know the story, before you are kind and considerate. Never put yourselves among the persecutors; and if in your turn you are persecuted, think of what fearful trials can be borne bravely by true hearts; and remember how in his own trial Bob came out strong and true, and learned cheerfully to bear ridicule for his mother's sake.

MEN OF THE SPIRIT.

The publication of the volume of Proceedings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, which we noted last week, has served to recall vividly to mind what was a great occasion in the history of our Free Churches in this country, and once more to set clearly before us that ideal of service to which, amid the present conditions of religious life at the beginning of a new century, we are especially called.

"Liberal Religious Thought at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century," is the title chosen for this volume, which gathers in the rich harvest of the meetings of the International Council held in London in Whit-week. It is a welcome circumstance that the book comes into our hands just now, when we are girding up our strength for the winter's work. It renews for us the memory of that time of happy fellowship with brethren of like mind and a common faith gathered together from many lands. It touches for us once more those springs of inspiration from which there came to us a new strength and gladness in the conviction that we are united in a great movement, that not in this country only, but wherever there are earnest and thoughtful men seeking for truth in religion and sincerity of life, there throughout the world we find those of kindred spirit with ourselves, kindled by a deep and holy faith in the Eternal, looking up to the Supreme Goodness, trusting in the Father's love, and working for the Kingdom of God on earth, with one ideal of true manhood, which has found its most complete fulfilment in the character and the religion of Jesus.

We shall do well, as we once more set ourselves to our several tasks in this most fruitful season of the Church's year, to remember that greater fellowship in which we have a part, the inspiration of a deeper, world-wide sympathy, the aspiration of a common purpose. While it is true that the claim on our fidelity would be the same even if we stood each one alone, there is a new appeal in the thought that we are working together, that we have the encouragement of companionship in strenuous labour, and that our faithfulness goes to make the strength of a common cause, and may add a fresh impulse to our brethren's brave endeavour.

Taking up this book we may find much that is good for warning and for encouragement. We may well take to heart the challenge that is contained in Mr. Graham Wallas's paper on "Religion and Empire," and ask ourselves whether Christianity as we conceive it, and as we live by it, is indeed capable of producing the true world-ethic, with power to control the great forces of the nations and to lead men of every race into the right attitude of brotherhood, while it furnishes the best answer to every question of our life in this great universe of God; and that further challenge of Mr. Tchertkoff to our Unitarianism, whether to its loyal service of truth it will add in full measure, by faithful practical endeavour, a realisation of true brotherhood among men. And in the same line of aspiration we may listen to Mr. Wicksteed's appeal and test our lives by the spirit of Wordsworth's poetry, and in the light of his faith in man and his true patriotism, see what is the worth of our professions of faith. All this will be wholesome, if only we are determined to be true and to give ourselves unreservedly to the service of God's truth.

But if, admitting the validity of every such questioning of our religion, we seek to go back to the foundation of it all, and to ask at this point of new departure what is our greatest need, what must be the first and chiefest aim in our churches and in the whole of our religious community, here again we find the answer recorded in this book of the International Council in no uncertain tones, but in many voices with one strong insistence.

The fundamental truth of all religion is that "God is Spirit." This, the President of the International Council declared in his opening address, has been realised anew by the Liberal Faith.

> The first principle of the Liberal Faith is the right of the soul to an open way to God; no church can limit it to chartered channels; always and everywhere God's grace is freely given; always and everywhere the Father's welcome is ready for the children who seek Him in trust, humility, and love. This is the truth which we have learnt from Jesus. This is the Gospel we have to carry through the world.

Professor Pfleiderer urged that the religious consciousness must return into its own field of the Spirit, and that the present crisis "will help to eliminate the unspiritual elements of traditional Christianity, and bring into clearer view as its real essence the religion of spirit and of truth." Professor Réville declared that "the liberal Protestant must be not only a man of a chapel, he must be a man of the Spirit"; and his colleague, the Rev. E. Fontanes described the religion, which was perfected in Jesus, as "basing man's trust in a principle of Supreme Love, trust, that is in the Heavenly Father."

Mr. Stopford Brooke declared this as the truth we have to teach: "Each soul is in God, and God is in each soul for ever. It was the truth Christ taught. It is the root of Christianity." And, further :—

> "The life of God is illimitable Love, and the life of man is only found in union with God, in union with self-forgetful Love. Whatever is not of Love, is against God and against Man, and is a part of death." That is the master truth and law of the spiritual universe.

And Dr. Drummond, in concluding his address on "The Spiritual Factor of Life and Modern Materialism," said :—

> It is for us to revive the drooping fires of faith, and, when we have removed the obstructions that have spread themselves between the soul and God, to lead men deeper into that spiritual life which has breathed through all the Christian ages, and found a home in every Christian church. We need a new reformation—not so much a reconstruction of theology, as a rekindling of religion in its originality and power, a deepening of the Christ-life in the heart of mankind.

These testimonies might be multiplied, from Holland and Transylvania and Italy, no less than from France and Germany, and our own country, concentrating our thought on the one supreme truth of religion, that "God is Spirit," that our worship must be in immediate spiritual communion with the Eternal, who is our Father, and that we are to seek to enter more and more deeply into that spiritual life with God, perfected in the knowledge of His love.

Of the help we receive from Jesus in the attainment of this great end, and of his office in a spiritual Christianity, we must speak in another article, which will follow this. Here we wish only to point to the foundation truth, to which we must ever return, and from which every impulse of fuller life must take its origin. As our churches are all dedicated to the worship of God in the freedom of the Spirit, so now we must turn with fresh endeavour, in reverent humility, and earnest seeking for the life which is of God, to that worship which can be only in spirit and in truth. We must be "men of the Spirit" indeed, if we would bear our testimony and fulfil our mission as servants of the Truth, and be open to new light that shall shine into dark places, and kindle a new and redeeming power of religion in the world.

THE BICENTENARY OF THE OLD MEETING HOUSE, MANSFIELD.

The celebrations of this event were preceded by the annual meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association on Tuesday, Sept. 24.

Morning prayer was conducted by the Revs. T. Lloyd Thomas, Dr. Griffiths, and E. G. Evans, B.A., and a powerful sermon, which is to be published, was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood on "The Place of the Church in Modern Life." The offertory amounted to £7 8s. 6d.

After lunch in the Town Hall, to which about eighty sat down, the business meeting was held, Mr. William Evans, in the absence of Mr. Franklin Winser, J.P., residing.

After the roll had been called, the treasurer, Mr. B. Dowson, read the financial statement, and in the course of a few explanatory remarks said that whilst there had seen a good response for the scheme of a district missionary, the subscriptions and collections were slightly below the mark. Subscriptions amounted to £114 1s. 0d. as against £117 8s. 0d. last year, and the total receipts to £421 6s. 0d. as against £480. Still there was a balance in hand of £21.

The secretary, Mr. Gow, read the reports of the churches and the annual report of the Association. The chief event of the year had been the appointment of Dr. Griffiths as district missionary, to reside and minister at Ilkeston and organise work at Burton and other neighbourhoods. Towards the expense of the scheme the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, had guaranteed £58 for three years, and the Great Meeting, Leicester, £50. Substantial help had also been given by Mrs. Hollins, of Mansfield, Miss Swanwick, of Chesterfield, and Mr. Moss, of Loughborough. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association had generously promised £100 for the same period.

The report was adopted, and the officers elected, Mr. J. Harrop White, of Mansfield, being appointed president. A cordial vote of thanks was sent to the late president, Mr. Winser, whose absence through ill-health was much regretted. Only illness prevented his taking the office for the third time. Votes of thanks were also passed to Mr. Wood and the ministers who had officiated that morning, and to the Old Meeting House congregation for their hospitality.

Tea was then served in the schoolroom, and the company was largely augmented by the arrival of friends for the Bicentenary proceedings.

CONVERSAZIONE.

These commenced with a conversazione in the Victoria Hall the same evening. The spacious room was handsomely decorated, and some 250 guests enjoyed the music and other good things provided. Alderman J. E. Birks welcomed the visitors in the name of the congregation, and replies were made by the Mayor, Mr. H. Smith, for the townspeople; by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., on behalf of the National Conference; and by Mr. J. C. Warren, M.A., for the North Midland Association. Among items of interest during the evening was the accompaniment, by Miss Dorothea Hollins, to a song of her own composition, admirably rendered by Mr. Arthur Vallance. The ancient trust deed of the Old Meeting House of 1701, and the still more ancient one of the kindred High Pavement Chapel, 1691, were on show, with other historical relics. The conversation was of a most animated character and went on briskly to the end of the three hours. Some who had said they would "look in" for a few minutes stayed, it was observed, to the close, and were as reluctant as any to go home.

COMMEMORATION SERVICE AND CONFERENCE.

On Wednesday morning the chapel was filled for the commemoration service. Prayers was read by the minister, Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, B.A., and lessons by Rev. E. D. P. Evans, and Mr. A. W. Worthington, B.A., J.P., and a thanksgiving prayer was offered by the Rev. Charles A. Well-beloved. Special psalms, an anthem, "Rejoice in the Lord," and the hymn, "We love the venerable house," were sung. Mr. Drury, R.A.M., the organist, ably accompanied.

A conference followed in the schoolroom, which was crowded.

Mr. William Godfrey said it gave him great pleasure as chapel warden to take the chair, and, on behalf of the congregation, to extend the welcome given the previous evening. He hoped they would all feel, especially members of other denominations, that their presence was a source of rejoicing. Personally, he was proud to have some share in the occasion. He had enjoyed the benefits of association with the chapel and Sunday-school from his infancy. He found from an old register that he was admitted as a scholar on Aug. 14, 1859, when he was four years of age, and until he resigned the post of superintendent of the Sunday-school in January last his name had never been off the register of the school, either as scholar, teacher, or superintendent. For many years he had been permitted to take an active part in the management of the church itself, and the debt he owed to the Old Meeting House only a long lifetime of devotion could repay. He could assure them that he yielded to none in admiration nor in veneration for the dear Old Meeting House.

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., then read a paper, which we hope to publish next week, on "The Religious Movement which led to the founding of the Old Meeting House." Their denomination, he said, was to be traced from the time of the old English Presbyterians. The Non-subscribing movement owed its character largely to the genius of one man, Richard Baxter. As long back as 1650 he had declared that two things had set the Church on fire, and had been its plague for 1,000 years; firstly, insisting upon creed and making more fundamentals than ever God made, and, secondly, the imposing of a creed of confessions in our own words and phrases. He stood, therefore, for the widest liberty. In 1662 Nonconformity became a permanent factor of English religious life. From the years 1688 to 1700 no less than 2,418 licences for places of worship were taken out, but whether in every case a corresponding building was erected he was not able to say.

The Rev. E. I. Fripp said that as he had already given a sketch of the history of the Old Meeting in the book of the bicentenary, he would only draw their attention to a few prominent features of their story and add some particulars. In the first place their history gave emphatic denial to the statement that their churches were not Free until their congregations were Unitarian. In this case, at any rate, they had been a free church, a church with an open trust and an open membership, a church without sectarian or doctrinal name, from the year of its foundation in 1701 to the present hour. Happily, their birthday was not in the year of grace, 1825, the middle year of the very dullest decade in the nineteenth century, when a British and Foreign Association was started with a narrow doctrinal condition of membership, excluding all Christians but those who would propagate Unitarian worship. Nor were they born in the year 1850, a glorious year if only for the appearance of two great religious poems, liberal and comprehensive in the largest sense, Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and Browning's "Christmas Eve and Easter Day," when, however, benevolent Christians, in a spirit of sectarian charity, founded a society in the Midlands for the benefit of their ministers on the condition that they should write themselves down Unitarian Christians. Their forefathers were not men of that stamp. They made no doctrinal limitations. They built the Old Meeting House on trust "for the exercise of religious worship." That was enough. They would not dictate to ministers or members the theology they should profess. They had such faith in freedom and the guidance of God that they said in effect, "Let our descendants believe and worship as they think best." Unitarians as most of them might be now, they, happily, took their origin not from Unitarians of that year of blessing 1825, nor of 1850, but from broad-minded Trinitarians of the year 1701 or earlier. Also let them be thankful that during the two hundred years of their worship in the Old Meeting House the congregation had been true as steel to the broad principles of the founders, and had never closed nor half-closed its doors to people of other beliefs. From the beginning to the present day all had been welcome, not only to their worship but to their membership. No doctrinal name on their chapel board had ever, so far as he knew, warned off strangers or informed the public that they would be expected there to accept certain conclusions. Their chapel was the Meeting House in 1701; it was the Old Meeting House in 1901; and he prayed God it might be so until they had formed and joined that Free Catholic Church for which they had worked and laboured for 200 years. That brought him to the second important characteristic of their chapel history. He knew no Meeting House which originated more distinctly in Unwilling Dissent. They were Nonconformists by compulsion, not by choice. Their congregation began as a Puritan section of that worshipping in St. Peter's Church, and their withdrawal was at first only partial, and, for a quarter of a century, regarded on their side as merely temporary. Whitlock, Reynolds, Porter, and the other nonconforming clergymen who found a refuge in Mansfield, attended the service of the vicar, the Rev. John Firth, took communion from him, and held their own worship at an hour which would not conflict with that in the parish church. They did not like to be cut off from the ancient national communion, and cherished the hope of a return on honourable and just conditions. Not until it was obvious that the Church of England would not readmit them did they build a home of their own. And that spirit of kinship with the mother body, of connection with patriotic and venerable tradition had been more or less preserved. He thought the name that best described them was "Reformed Church of England." Not only had their liturgies been modelled in some measure on the old Book of Common Prayer, but whatever views they might individually hold as to the undesirability of state establishments, they still desired to belong to a genuinely national fellowship. He believed he was expressing an opinion general among them when he said that they loved the idea of a true and broad Church of England which should maintain historic continuity and at the same time include all people who wished to worship God and serve man in the spirit of Jesus Christ. He was not aware of any hostility to the English Church, as such, but he had met with much keen regret that the Church should keep up its old barriers and weaken its influence by insistence on doctrines which were to a large extent mere superstition in the eyes of a growing multitude of thoughtful men. Never had the Church greater opportunities, and never was it more desperately needed; but unless reformed it was incapable of grappling with the serious doubts and the deadly sins of the world. Because he loved the Church with a passionate yearning, he lamented its narrow limitations and ineffectiveness. Coming to names and figures, he would leave it to Mr. Worthington to trace the connection between themselves and Richard Baxter through the family of the Sylvesters. Matthew Sylvester, who collected the Reliquiae Baxterianae and assisted Baxter in ministering to the congregation whose descendants now worship in Stamford-street, London, was a relative of Robert and Charity Sylvester who gave them the strip of land running from Stockwell-gate to Meeting House-lane, then called "the Hill," on which their chapel and schools now stood. Whitlock and Reynolds, the evicted clergymen from St. Mary's, Nottingham, who found a refuge in Mansfield, linked them with their friends at the High Pavement, Nottingham. Between the Five Mile Act in 1666, and the Act of Toleration in 1668, they used to go to and from Nottingham to preach secretly to their people; and, as Whitlock told them, "When we could not with any safety go over to preach to our own people, we made sermons and sent over the notes to them." It was at Mr. Whitlock's house chiefly that their congregation at Mansfield assembled before the building of the Meeting House. He (Mr. Fripp) was interested to notice that in the one or two sermons published by Mr. Whitlock he described himself by the general title of "Minister of Christ," or "Minister of the Gospel." In Mansfield he was visited by the Puritan Lord Wharton, of whom there existed an extremely fine portrait in his youth, he believed by Van Dyke. The ministry among them of Robert Porter, who had claims in the absence of contrary evidence, to be their first regular minister, was the longest, if they had his dates correctly, in their annals; and like the three other long ministries, which had been also most successful—namely, Mr. Heywood's, Mr. Williams', and Mr. Worthington's—it was uncontroversial. Though it had made its converts, controversy had not been the food on which the Old Meeting flourished. Porter's steady and peaceful ministry of thirty-four years, and Eliezer Heywood's of thirty-three years, were the chief agencies, they might believe, in raising the congregation to the degree of "religion and politeness happily blended," humorously referred to by Harrod in 1801. The earliest ministry which seemed to have been of a controversial character was that of John Bull. It only lasted ten or eleven years, but it was long enough to gain him the title of Mansfield Bull. At the same time, another argumentative parson, David Peter Davies, of Belper, went by the name of "Rabbi David," and a rhymster in the Trinitarian camp addressed him, in 1801, thus:—

O rabbi, rabbi! you are much too bad,
For treating sacred truth with twits and scorns:
You far exceed the Mansfield Bull so mad,
Who strives to gore the scriptures with his horns.

This "Mad Bull" was the first, so far as he could gather, to call the Old Meeting House by the misleading name "Unitarian chapel." Happily he was succeeded by a man of a different stamp, the Rev. John Williams, who came from that true home of spiritual religion, Northgate-end Chapel, Halifax, and ministered for twenty-four years to a congregation which grew steadily in numbers and social influence. William Linwood was a great Radical, who gave considerable offence to the well-to-do trustees. The chapel was crowded by his admirers, who were by no means confined to lack-pennies, and included not a few of the gentler sex. So great was the desire to hear his sermons that the Congregational minister, Mr. Weaver, once took his flock to listen to a discourse on "Calvinism," and at the end of it, if not in the midst of it, rose up to rebuke him, feeling, he said, "like a vessel that must vent."

Mr. A. W. Worthington, who had a most cordial reception, was called upon to contribute "Personal Reminiscences." He might, he said, have entered into a description and personal anecdotes of the many worthy men and women whom he knew and respected, and indeed loved, during his ministry in Mansfield, but it seemed to him fitter to enter on mattert not likely to be known to the presens generation than to attempt any sketch of personalities they themselves had known and appreciated. The earliest picture that presented itself in the history of that congregation was the notable assembly of ejected clergymen in Mansfield about the year 1662, and it was indeed a happy commencement for the congregation that such a knot of earnest, self-denying men should assemble in close friendship and gather round them by their preaching a body, as it was officially reported at the time, of some forty or fifty worshippers. The next picture he could give them was of the erection of that meeting house just 200 years ago. During the ministry of Mr. Samuel Coates, Robert and Charity Sylvester, who resided, he believed, in the old Parsonage House, transferred the copyhold land on which the chapel stood to trustees. Those trustees and their successors had, from time to time, been admitted on the Duke of Portland's rolls. They held it on the most liberal terms of any trust he knew. The chapel was erected a solid square structure, with a well roof, supported by two of the splendid oak pillars which were still its pride. Having shown that the family of Sylvester was of note in those days, and that one of them was the ancestress of Mr. J. H. Wilson, once of Sherwood Farm, Mr. Worthington pointed out that it was not the only leading family connected with the congregation in that day. The Parsonage appeared to have been purchased for the chapel by five equal loans, and he thought the amount was £100. One of the loans was made by Samuel Brunts, who, in his will, left the amount to the chapel, with an additional small annual payment to be made for the benefit of the minister. The interest of Brunts in the congregation, though he believed he was not always resident in Mansfield, and was buried elsewhere, was shown by the fact that of the trustees of his charity a majority, for a long period of years, was chosen from the members of the congregation. After reference to the Heywoods, and to the Rev. Samuel Catlow, Mr. Worthington briefly touched on the school conducted in the Parsonage by the Rev. Joseph Bull after Mr. Catlow's death. Under Mr. Bull's direction the pupils planted the row of poplar trees in the approach to his house, which grew to be very fine trees, but of which scarcely one now remains. The work of education was carried on, in conjunction with the ministry, by his successor, the Rev. John Williams, and so prosperously that he built himself the house now occupied by Mr. Patterson. During this period, including the ministry of the Rev. C. W. Robberds, the congregation held a leading position in the town. Though not, he believed, numerous, it included a large proportion of the chief families. The Brodhursts for many generations were among its prominent and liberal supporters, while they did much to maintain the industry and prosperity of the town. The Paulsons were well known for several generations. Mr. Walkden was a member of the congregation, and their late friend, Mr. Handley, told him that Mr. Walkden invited him to a seat in his pew, and that he thus formed a connection with the chapel. The name of Heywood had but lately become extinct, though the family had survivors. Of the family of Hollins still connected with them, it was needless to speak. Their attachment to the chapel, and their generous and tasteful contribution to its renewal and adornment, and the recent addition of a new and commodious parsonage, were well known, and he trusted that connection and interest might still be kept up. He had enumerated those families at that stage of his chronicle, because the work of the next minister, the Rev. W. Linwood, tended to alienate the interest of most of them from the chapel. When he left the chapel was closed for twelve months, and reopened under the charge of Mr. Teggin. About that time a remarkable secession from the Baptists laid the foundation of a new era of prosperity for the congregation. Two of the young men, Mr. John Birks and Mr. George Vallance, and the minister, the Rev. John Austen, changed their opinions in favour of the Unitarians, and he need not tell them how those three families had increased the congregation. Looking at the present beautiful condition of the building, he found it almost impossible to describe clearly its appearance forty years ago. It was a square building, entered by two doors from the narrow path out of the Lawn, opposite to which stood the pulpit, with a table pew below. The pews were of the old high-backed order, made of painted deal. A rather shabby gallery between the entrance doors was used for the school children, while the chapel was warmed by a furnace sunk in a sort of pit underneath the gallery. No one could have anticipated the wonderful improvement which was effected. The oak pillars, previously squared with plaister and painted, were, at great labour, cut into regular form and polished. The interior of the chapel was altered to its present condition, though its square form was for a time retained. The structure was substantially restored from floor to roof, little remaining unaltered except the old walls and the roof timbers. A subsequent effort led to the erection and adornment of the chancel and, in quite recent years, the oak panelling was added. The alterations must have led to an outlay sufficient for the erection of a new chapel; but the attachment to the old place was great, and the result need only be seen to prove its success. He well remembered, at the first re-opening, Mr. Coe preaching from the text, "To what purpose is this waste?" with a wave of the hand to the communion table, and then amply justifying such liberal expenditure of wealth upon that house of God. The funds of the congregation had greatly increased during the last forty years. At that time, in addition to the old Parsonage, there was only one moderate endowment of invested money. Then Mrs. Woodhead, of Chesterfield, left to the chapel property in Stockwell-gate, which brought in, he dared say, a goodly income. The late Mr. Hollins presented the house occupied recently by their ministers, which had, he believed, been disposed of to great advantage. And now Mrs. Hollins has added a new Parsonage. Thus, with a beautiful chapel, a fair amount of endowment, and good school buildings, there was every opportunity for the congregation to flourish and increase. Years ago it formed a band of earnest, active and united fellow-worshippers. He believed their number had actually grown, and their zeal and brotherhood should emulate that which existed among their parents and grandparents. They had an earnest and able minister, and he trusted they would secure for him as many happy years' ministry among them as their fathers and grandsires secured for twenty-one years to himself.

The Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved also gave some "Reminiscences," and spoke of the happy three years he had spent in Mansfield, with a united and prosperous congregation.

Mr. William A. Vallance presided subsequently at lunch in the Town Hall, where the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, and Joseph Wood spoke of the "Superannuation Scheme" undertaken by the National Conference. Much interest was shown in the matter, afterwards proved by the collection of about £40, and great satisfaction was felt at the assurances that the Fund should be doctrinally open, and should always be a National Conference institution.

Beautiful weather favoured a largely attended garden party in the afternoon in the united grounds of the Parsonage, Brooklands (Aldermen Birks') and Layton Burrow (Mr. J. Harrop White's). A large tent was erected for refreshments, and Mr. T. W. Renshaw's band, which had provided the music the night before, again performed. Peculiar pleasure was felt at the presence, among many others, of the vicar, the Rev. H. S. Arkwright, M.A., and Mrs. Arkwright, and the Congregational minister, the Rev. J. G. Tolley, and Mrs. Tolley. Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, Belper, Ilkeston, Sheffield and Newark sent contingents. The Rev. W. W. Robinson was present from far away Gainsborough. It was a delightful, not to say inspiring, occasion.

PUBLIC MEETING.

These two happy days, ever memorable to the Mansfield congregation, and perhaps not soon to be forgotten by visitors, came to an end with a largely attended public meeting in the Victoria Hall.

After a hymn and prayer the Chairman (Rev. E. I. Fripp) gave an address on "Liberal Christianity," which was followed by addresses from the Rev. Jos. Wood ("The Word of God; What it is and Where it is"), the Rev. R. A. Armstrong ("Vivacity in Religion"), Mr. J. Harrop White, Town Clerk of Mansfield ("The Duty of Laymen in Religion"), and the Rev. F. K. Freeston ("The Open Door." A further address by the Rev. H. Gow had to be omitted owing to the lateness of the hour.

On Friday evening the children of the Sunday-school were treated to a tea and entertainment, and on Sunday the Harvest services were held, morning, afternoon and evening, there being large congregations.

A University Settlement Wedding.—On Oct. 1 (writes a correspondent) an interesting wedding was celebrated at the Canning Town University Settlement. The bridegroom was Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A., a son of Mrs. Alfred Lawrence, who has lived and worked at the Settlement for several years. The bride was Miss Emmeline Pethick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Pethick, of Weston-super-Mare. Miss Pethick has been associated with the Esperance Girls' Club and the Maison Esperance since their inauguration, and it was to be noted that her dress was made by the girls of the Co-operative Workroom. Besides the relatives of the bride and bridegroom, among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Courtney, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Lough, and Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd-George. There was also a large party of girls from the Esperance Club, a number of children, the old ladies from the St. Marylebone Workhouse, the Canning Town Settlement Men's Club, and the band of which Mr. Lawrence is treasurer. The service was held in the Public Hall, and was conducted by the Rev. Mark Guy Pearce, the Rev. Frank Freeston, and the Rev. Percy Alden, Warden of the Settlement. Mr. W. J. L. Higley officiated at the organ, and played the "Wedding March." During the reception which followed the girls of the Esperance Club sang several glees, and the children of the Junior Club danced a cymbal dance which had been especially arranged for them. To those who mark the signs of the times there was much significance in the happy gathering of all sorts and conditions of folks to wish good luck to those who have spent so many happy years in their midst.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

The recruited energies of the workers in our London churches appear to be pushing out in all directions, judging from reports. There is evident need of all their strength, for while the lapse of time is sadly marked by the losses that occur through death, removals and other changes, it brings no diminution in the weight of the problems social and religious which press upon every intelligent and sensitive mind. There is a vast population—in one sense "fields white unto harvest"; but the wheat is so migratory that a good deal of alertness is required to get it in and keep it there. Districts change rapidly, and mostly not advantageously. Where lately there were quiet residences of fairly cultured people, there start up rows of little houses, or larger houses divided into flats, with melancholy shops at the street-corners and on leading thoroughfares, gaping for business that does not come. The new comers into such districts are usually "strugglers," very much in need of religious help and inspiration, but very little disposed to seek it. Of the other kinds of districts two distinct types come prominently into notice—the first, that where well-to-do people congregate and gather about them the signs of more or less luxury, including the church to which everybody in the district who is anybody goes; the second, that patch of mean streets where a grey squalor settles upon everything and mocks every form of religious organisation alike. Our churches have a full share of the difficulties of all these surroundings.

Up then, and to the work! That is the order of the day. On Tuesday next the Provincial Assembly for these parts will meet at Kensington, and we may be assured that nothing that the Essex Church folk and their minister can do will be spared in the effort to render the occasion profitable and stimulating. The handsome church in the Mall has just been refurbished, and already the local life has responded encouragingly to its opportunities. Mr. Freeston's monthly calendar is a model of neatness, and is written in an admirable spirit. The Conference "Guild" movement, which was inaugurated at Whitsuntide, is taking hold here in a very promising way, and the minister's work amongst the young people, leading up to a service of consecration, is amongst the most prominent and valuable of the activities carried on.

Kilburn and Kensington both begin with the same letter; otherwise it would not appear to a student of the map that they are next-door neighbours. Such, however, are London distances, that it is even so. The congregation in Quex-road is in some respects as remarkable as any in our district. It was founded chiefly by the Hampstead friends and Dr. Herford as a definite piece of missionary enterprise; a scheme was laid down for its establishment and maintenance during a stated period; and the remarkable circumstance is that the scheme looks like being carried out to the letter. Only three years more remain out of the time allowed for growing to self-support, and the advance made is seen from the fact that whereas seven years ago when Mr. Stronge became pastor the grants-in-aid amounted to £220, they will only be £60 this year.

All this means a very high degree of devotion, and while the success attained has been fully deserved it should encourage others who are not afraid of the cost of such a victory. An interesting piece of work now going on is that of the Unity Club, which has its Social Problem Section, Religious Conference Section, and Congregational Society Section, all of which are expected to prove very valuable. A "Forward Movement" will take place in November and December.

At Hampstead, the parent stock of Kilburn, the minister holds weekly religious conferences; formerly they were chiefly for the young, but now they are open to others. The conferences are carried by the members themselves with a minimum of pastoral intervention, and stirrings of deep thought and feeling are manifest. This is truly fructifying work. As is well known, Mr. Stopford Brooke will preach here fortnightly on Sunday mornings, from Oct. 13. Whoso is wise and prudent will take good note of the time of service, and intelligently anticipate the inflow of visitors.

Highgate is in happier mood than for some time past, there being a very confident hope that a successor to the late beloved minister, Mr. Spears, is at last found; but as all is not quite formally concluded any announcement just now would be injudicious. It is good to observe how well the societies and institutions connected with the congregations have been kept up during the trials of the long interregnum. If they do so well amid such difficulties, what may not be expected when they have the help of an efficient leader again!

Wood Green hoped to be opening its new church this month, but some little delays postpone the event into next month. It will be a joyous occasion when it does come, and perhaps be none the worse for coming after the first crowded rush is over. Whether Lewisham will get itself a new church by and by, or in some other way extend the borders which are already somewhat narrow for its needs, there is no doubt that under Mr. Pope's guidance his loyal and attached friends there will continue to make progress. The Literary Society there is quite a feature in the life of the district. At Plumstead, too, the congregation are busily attacking their problems, one of which is that of meeting the practical challenge laid down in the conditions of help from the great Bazaar Fund in extinguishing their debt. Mr. Jones has abundant energy and cannot fail to infect a congregation with his own zeal. Their local bazaar will take place early next year, and deserves all support. Forest Gate also is also looking up, though the present position of the church is not quite satisfactory, and plans of removal are discussed. They may or may not be carried further; but it is certain that the remarkably intelligent band of workers now gathering round Mr. Perris will give a good account of themselves this season.

The other congregations are mostly of older date than those just mentioned; but they are evidently not leaving their younger brethren to do all the work. For instance, Clarence-road, Kentish Town, has completed an investment to cover the ground rent, and so lift a heavy load from the finances; and the work generally goes on well and steadily. At Little Portland-street, also, brave workers are doing their best amid the crowded desert of the city streets. Hackney is beginning its winter classes and recreation evenings for boys and girls, and its revived Social Union is meeting with much success. Mr. Bloor says he wants a gymnasium instructor and a bagatelle board. Who will respond? Dr. Hicks, who made a very bold experiment at Islington in 1899 with a series of elementary lessons on the Philosophy of Kant, met with so much encouragement that the course was followed by another last season, and will be succeeded this season by a course on English Philosophy in the Nineteenth Century. On the other hand, a Girls' Club, recently started, does good work amongst the very poorest of the district. Happy blend of deep thinking and simple practical charities! The Literary Society here also does good work. At Brixton, to cross southward again, things appear prosperous, and one of the new works of the season will be a series of lectures on "Nursing," given by our friend Dr. Burridge. Friends from other congregations will be admitted to the course on favourable terms. Peckham is undergoing some needful repairs to the building, and is addressing itself to repair some serious losses by removals, &c. May each endeavour be fully successful. At Blackfriars the work is wholly among the poor—the scale may be judged in part from the fact that 1,300 visits are paid weekly to the homes of depositors in the Collecting Savings' Bank. Every evening in the week (except Saturday) has its special engagement, and a small army of workers are enrolled; but the cry is still for more!

So far as I hear the same kind of report might be made respecting all our missions, while at some places like Bermondsey and Walthamstow the need is pathetically urgent. But here the spectacle opened out is too wide for treatment in a sentence or two. Enough now to say that unless we can keep at least a few such places going we are poorest of the poor ourselves as a religious people.

The only other note I will add to this miscellany is that at Stoke Newington (which surely deserves better things, as names whose praise in all the churches would prove), there has been within recent times not one burglary alone, but two. Alas! what do they expect who break through and steal in places at once so reverend and so austerely simple? Would that the "open door," always preserved here, had attracted the notice of the evil-doers, so that better riches than the few pence and pair of old shoes that were stolen might have been freely and honourably theirs.

W. G. Tarrant.

MOSS SIDE UNITARIAN CHURCH, MANCHESTER.

OPENED SATURDAY, OCT. 5, 1901.

This church has resulted from an effort started in 1887, the Rev. Charles Ropef, B.A., becoming the minister-in-charge in 1888. Under his ministry the congregation has thriven, and now ranks amongst the most important in Manchester. In 1891 a church hall was opened, which served also for school and general purposes, the whole, with land and furnishing, costing £4,000. In thirteen years the membership has increased from about forty to six times that number. It being evident that larger premises were needed, the late Mr. William Roberts announced the munificent subscription of £4,000 towards the new building fund, and though he did not live to see the realisation of the scheme his great generosity stimulated the efforts of all concerned, and led the way to the present successful issue. The new church has cost £6,000, and has been paid for practically by the members alone. An additional £1,000 is required to equip it with an organ and other desirable furniture, and, as the congregation desire to start with as little debt as possible, at this juncture they invite the help of outside friends. There are at present three handsome memorial windows in the church, the chancel window (by Heaton, Butler, and Baynes) being especially noteworthy; it is devoted to the memory of Mr. Roberts. The church will seat about 500, and will ultimately be lighted by electricity, though at present the current is not available. At the service this (Saturday) afternoon the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will preach, and the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C.,) and other gentlemen will give addresses at a meeting to be held in the evening. On subsequent Sundays the preachers will be the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, J. Page Hopps, F. Walters, and W. Copeland Bowie, in the order given.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Harvest Services.

The week's reports include the following special harvest thanksgiving services just held :—Chester.—Collections for the hospital; congregations numerous (see also separate report). Capelybryn.—Service, Friday, Sept. 27. Good congregation. Addresses by the Rev. T. A. Thomas, Pantydefaid, and Mr. E. O. Jenkins, H.M.C. Manchester. Collection for British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Altrincham.—Morning preacher, the Rev. Dendy Agate; evening, the Rev. H. E. Dowson. Congregations and collections were good. Aberdare (Highland Place).—Sermons on Sunday by the Rev. W. James, J.P.; and on Monday by the Rev. T. A. Thomas. Large congregations, and result was satisfactory. Cheltenham.—Preacher, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones (Liverpool). Barret's "Harvest Cantata" was performed in the evening. The offertories were good, considering the continued absence from home of some members. Ainsworth.—Afternoon preacher, Rev. E. S. Hicks (Bolton); evening, the Rev. M. R. Scott (resident minister). Large congregations; good collections. Fruit, &c., distributed to the sick and aged on Monday evening. Gateshead.—Preacher, the Rev. H. Rawlings (York); good congregations and music. On Monday a fruit banquet and social gathering was largely attended. The Rev. A. Harvie (pastor) presided, and gave a short address, being followed by the Rev. H. Rawlings. At Tavistock also a thanksgiving service was held on Sunday. No further particulars sent. Pontypridd.—First festival held here. Mr. G. Leonard Phelps (H.M.C.) concluded a successful three months' engagement by taking the services afternoon and evening. Large congregations. Fruit, &c., sold on Monday, and proceeds sent to Winifred House. Kingswood (near Birmingham).—The Rev. J. Matthews preached; very good congregations. Good collections for the Kingswood Benevolent Fund. Fruit, &c., distributed to aged sick and poor. Stockton.—Preacher, Mr. J. Holman, of Cowdenbeach, N.B. Large congregations. Billingshurst.—Held on Sunday last. The church anniversary followed on Monday, when the Rev. F. K. Freeston preached. A public meeting followed, addresses being given by the Revs. G. Lansdown (pastor), F. K. Freeston, J. J. Marten, C. A. Hoddinott, and E. S. L. Buckland. All the proceedings were encouraging. Wisboro'.—Service on Sunday. On Tuesday a meeting and recreation-room was opened by the Rev. G. Lansdown; local friends have made the tables, fixed seats, &c., and donors of papers, books, or subscriptions would have been pleased to see the grateful satisfaction of the rural attendants at their new room. A week evening service will be held on Thursdays as well as Sunday afternoon service. Doncaster.—The Rev. H. Thomas preached; the evening congregation filled the church. Rademon.—Services 29th and 30th. Preacher, the Rev. J. J. Magill. London : Blackfriars.—Large congregations. Two scholars read lessons in the afternoon service, which was chiefly for children : the Rev. F. Allen conducted the services. Mansford-street.—The Rev. W. G. Cadman took the afternoon service on Sunday, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie that in the evening. Large attendances.

Auckland.—We have just received the New Zealand Herald, of Aug. 19, which gives an account of the laying of the foundation stones of the First Unitarian Church in the colony. Between two and three hundred persons attended the ceremony. The Rev. W. Jellie laid one of the stones, and Captain Lamb the other, presentation trowels being given by the congregation to these gentlemen. The building is to have a frontage of 30 feet, and a depth of 80 feet, the church itself occupying 50 feet of the depth, and ante-rooms being in the rear. It is estimated that the total cost, including seats and fittings, will be £1,100.

Bolton District Sunday School Union.—A meeting of the above Union was held in the schoolroom at Hindley on Sept. 21, when a paper was read by the Rev. E. S. Hicks on "The History and Development of Sunday Schools." There was a fairly good attendance, and a vigorous discussion followed, in which the points raised in the paper were debated, and there seemed to be a general feeling that the greatest obstacle to progress in the work was the difficulty of getting good and painstaking teachers. The scholars were ready to come if they found teachers there to take an interest in them. All the speakers were full of hope for the future if this difficulty could be overcome, and the unanimous opinion appeared to be that the Sunday-school had a great mission for the future, though its work might be somewhat different from that undertaken at its inception.

Chester.—On Sunday week the evening service was of a "Memorial" character, and the sermon on "The Menace to Social Order" had especial reference to the death of President McKinley. At the close of the service a meeting was held in the schoolroom, at which the Rev. H. E. Haycock, on behalf of the choir, teachers, and congregation, presented Miss Florence Orrett, who was leaving to enter a teacher's training college at Bristol, with a dressing case, and two volumns of poems, as a mark of their appreciation of her services in school and chapel, and as a token of their regard and esteem. Arrangements are being made for restarting the various school and congregational week-night meetings, and an effort is being made to raise the necessary money for the purchase of a piano. Altogether a successful winter's work is anticipated.

Dunmurry.—Miss Mabelle Biggart, of the United States, gave two interesting addresses in the First Presbyterian Church on Sunday. The Rev. J. A. Kelly (pastor loci) conducted the devotional portion of the services. Miss Biggart, who referred in the morning to the sympathy expressed towards her nation in the tragic death of President McKinley, also gave a lecture on "George Eliot" on Monday evening, to a most appreciative audience, including the Rev. Dr. Landers (Episcopalian), who moved a vote of thanks to the lecturer.

Liscard.—A welcome meeting was held at the Assembly Hall on the 27th ult. in connection with the settlement of the Rev. A. Ernest Parry (late of Kirkcaldy), as pastor. Numerous Liverpool friends attended. Mr. Woffenden, who presided, very cordially welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Parry on behalf of the congregation. Their new minister had come with excellent credentials, and already the congregations had grown. He wished him a very happy, successful, and long career in Liscard. Other addresses having been given by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, L. De Beaumont Klein, J. Morley Mills, and H. W. Hawkes. Mr. Parry responded, expressing the hope that he might justify in some degree their cordiality towards him, and that his work in the church and district might be fruitful in good results. Music was given at intervals. The whole proceedings were bright and cheering.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual service was held on Thursday evening, Sept. 26, in Hope-street Church, when the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst conducted the service, and the Rev. R. A. Armstrong preached the sermon. There were about fifty members and friends present, nearly all the schools affiliated to the Society being represented. In the course of his sermon Mr. Armstrong said it was a good thing for the teachers from the different schools to meet together, in order that they might gain some little help and inspiration at the beginning of their winter's work; and he would have them remember that it was God's work that they were helping on, and it should be done in all faithfulness and humility. They must try to subdue any feelings of self-importance in their scholars; they must care for them and let everything make way for them as in the home, but without letting the children know it; above all, they must strive to leave with the children, each Sunday, an idea and an ideal, and in order to do this they must themselves go to their work with an idea and an ideal firmly fixed in their minds.

Manchester : Willert-street.—The opening meeting of the new Guild was held Oct. 1, twenty-one members being enrolled. The Rev. John Ellis attended and assisted in organising the new society.

Newry.—The annual Sunday-school soirée and prize-giving took place on 27th ult., the Rev. S. C. Pinkerton presiding. The attendances have been very good, there being twenty-nine prize-winners.
